The nights have now grown cool, though, as yet, there have been no frosts, and the sun is still very hot for many hours of the day; but the leaves are beginning to change, and autumn is evidently here. The gathering of the sorghum has commenced, and I have seen few more pleasing phases of out-of-doors labor than that just now presented on these farms. In almost every house-yard the mill, often a rude one, with cylinders shaped by the axe and with cogs irregularly cut, is in slow motion, and its creaking can be heard a long way off. The horse as he jogs round brushes against huge piles of cane in the whole of his circuit. Women are boiling the syrup under a little shed near by. The crushed canes are mighty good, the negroes say, to lay in the field furrows and prevent the wash. Much of the hilly land has lost almost all its soil by the action of the rain-water torrents, and the hard clay beneath is scantily covered by thin grass, or stands out bare and barren, refusing to support vegetable life. Still the farmers find it profitable to keep these abandoned fields enclosed. I see small flocks of sheep everywhere, and sometimes fifty or a hundred acres seem to be given up to a herd of half a dozen cattle. Since leaving Lynchburg, I have never got so far from houses as not to find pigs in the woods and by the roadside picking up persimmons, digging for roots, and eating the white oak mast which now begins to fall. The good land of this region is used mainly for the production of cotton, and I saw some small fields white with the opening bolls as I rode along; but the crop was in bad order, the plants often being less than two feet high, and the quantity raised this year will be quite insignificant. These counties were never overrun by either army, and there seems to be a good deal of old cotton still in the hands of the producers. It may be seen, sometimes as many as fifty bales, piled in barns or in open sheds, and I met wagons on the road loaded with it. In Concord, a little village, the capital of Cabarrus County, a factory was in operation where white goods are made and cotton yarn is spun to be sold unmanufactured.

Just before reaching Concord, where I passed the night, I met a middle-aged negro plodding along, staff in hand, and apparently very footsore and tired. He had walked more than six hundred miles, he said, having set out from a plantation in Georgia, near the Alabama line, and had consumed almost two months in making the journey. He had been sold and sent South four years before, and, as soon as he learned he was free, determined to return to North Carolina and try to find his wife and children. "His own color," he said, "was friendly to him all the way." In Georgia negroes were doing very well; but in South Carolina "a many does n't dar to own they is got their liberty." He had no fears but that he would find work to do in Salisbury.

Riding out of Concord this morning I overtook a gentleman who was going out a few miles into the country to visit his plantation, and as long as our roads lay together we travelled in company. The conversation turned upon negroes as laborers, and he declared that since their emancipation they were nearly useless, and the only hope of the Southern agriculturist was in getting white farm-hands. Most of his acquaintances, in making their plans for next season, had decided to do as much as possible themselves, and to employ only as many colored people as were absolutely indispensable. The worst class of all were the young people of both sexes, who made twice as much noise about their freedom as their fathers and mothers did; but none were good. In his opinion, the first duty to be performed by the Legislature, when North Carolina should be fortunate enough to get a legislature, would be to pass an apprenticeship act, to be applied to all persons of color under twenty-one years of age, who, so far as was practicable, ought to be bound out to their former masters. Enactments with reference to the older negroes would also be necessary; they were unfit to make contracts or transact any business for themselves; some of them had got money within the last two or three months, and nine times in ten they laid it out in the most inconsiderate manner, spent it for some little notion or other. They had no ideas of economy, and were as destitute of foresight as a child. "Here 's a case in point," he said. "A friend of mine owned twenty-five or thirty, who have all been working on for him in the same way in which they have always worked. But last week one old nigger came to him and said he wished to be hired. 'Very well, I 'll hire you. How much do you want? Will ten dollars a month do?' The nigger thought it would. 'Then there 's your wife; what 's she worth?' They agreed that eight dollars a month would be enough for her. 'Well, there 's Tom '—that was the oldest child—'I 'm willing to give him his victuals and clothes.' Yes, that was fair. 'But you 've got four too small to do anything; I can't keep them unless you 'll give me something for doing it; I can't undertake to keep them for less than five dollars a month.' The nigger thought that was no more than right, and appeared to be in high glee over his bargain. 'But look here,' said my friend; 'you and your wife I'm to pay eighteen dollars a month, and you are to pay me twenty dollars a month for your four children. Now, where will you be at the end of the year?' The darkey began to consider the subject, and finally concluded that his best way was to go on as he had before."

"But," said I, "is n't five dollars a month a good deal to pay for the board and clothing of four children too small to do any work?"

I had seen boys of not more than thirteen or fourteen years old at the plough, and am told that it is not unusual for boys and even girls of that age to plough quite well.

"No," he answered; "their clothes do n't cost much, to be sure; but a child will eat as much as a man—eat and waste."

The usual allowance of food to an adult on these plantations is a bushel of corn a month, and three pounds of bacon a week, though sometimes the ration of meat is omitted. Estimating the cost of these articles at a rate somewhat higher than what I believe to be the average price, the monthly expense of feeding an adult is not far from three dollars and a half. The average monthly cost of feeding children under twelve years of age may probably be two dollars and a half. Clothes, as this gentleman said, doubtless cost little; very many of the negro boys whom I have seen in Virginia and in this State had on but a single garment, a coarse shirt, flowing nearly to the heels, and the girl's frock, though different in shape, was of similar material. It seems to me, therefore, that the expense of boarding and clothing children whose ages range from infancy to twelve years must be very much less than sixty dollars a piece per annum.

After answering some questions which the gentleman put to me in reference to the political sentiments of the North, I asked in turn if the State Convention would probably declare the evidence of negroes admissible in courts of justice.

"The right to testify for and against each other in cases where no white man is concerned," he replied, "they have always had, and of course it will be continued to them; but I do n't think the Southern people are prepared to admit nigger testimony against a white man. What would be the good of putting niggers in the witness-box? You must have niggers in the jury-box, too, or nigger evidence will not be believed. I do n't think you could find twelve men in the whole State who would attach any weight to the testimony of ninety-nine niggers in a hundred."

He was willing that the colored population should be educated, but not without making a proviso which, he thought, would be displeasing to Northern radicals—that white and black children should be taught in separate schools. Nothing should be done that looked towards the social equality of negroes and whites. The only result of that would be a horrible one—miscegenation and the worst forms of immorality, and, eventually, the driving out of the white race by a wretched population made up of half-castes and mixed breeds. His opinions on these subjects are such as seem to be generally prevalent in this part of the State. The publishers of the Carolina Times, in their prospectus of a daily edition of that journal, say:

"We trust to see fully inaugurated a generous and humane policy towards the freedmen, and all proper means used to educate them up to the point that will make them intelligent and useful free laborers—beyond that the law of nature forbids us to go. . . . . To ameliorate their condition, and to make them useful and self-supporting, should be the care of the approaching Legislature. That much may be done by that body by the enactment of a compulsory code of enforced labor we do not doubt. Experience in the emancipated colonies proves that that is the only course to keep the negro from dying out or relapsing into barbarism."

One is led to reflect on the propriety of allowing negroes to testify in courts by the not infrequent occurrence, even in a community generally well disposed towards the colored people, of scenes like this. A negro called Amaziah, formerly owned by a man residing near Charlotte, left the plantation some months ago, because he found it impossible to live peaceably with his employer, a man of a violent temper and addicted to drinking. There was no open outbreak, however. It being desirable to despatch some mowing speedily, and Amaziah being a very good hand, the gentleman sent his overseer, and the negro was induced to return and work for a few days. One day last week Mr. W. and his son came into Charlotte, and both went home intoxicated. As they drove into the yard the negro was sharpening a scythe, for the day was wet and field-work impossible. He was ordered to leave the place, and come back when the sun shone. Not a damned free nigger should stay there when he was n't wanted. The man was on his way out of the yard when he was attacked by Mr. W. for moving too slowly—for not running, the other negroes say. He resisted, and his antagonist, being hardly in a fit condition for making a good fight, was being overpowered, when the son, getting a gun from the house, came out to his father's assistance. The gun was snapped twice, but without effect, and then the negro was beaten with it over the head till it was broken into three pieces. The elder W. has since crossed the State line, and is for the present in South Carolina. The evidence of which I have given a digest was offered at the son's trial, or rather at a preliminary investigation of the case by the Superintendent of Freedmen.

I see that two schools for colored children are in operation at this point, which are attended by about one hundred and twenty-five pupils. In both of them the teachers are negroes, but I am informed that larger schools will be opened as soon as buildings can be had, and white teachers are to be sent from Philadelphia by the Society of Friends.

CASTE FEELING IN ENGLAND.

LONDON, September 16, 1865.

THE domestic servant controversy, to which I alluded in my last week's letter, still rages with unabated vigor. And curiously enough at this very moment a case has occurred in real life, which illustrates the true character of domestic service in England far more accurately than all the discussions in the world. The other day, a Mr. Crosse, vicar of Ockham, gave his former groom into custody on a charge of having abducted his daughter, not being of age, from her home. The story, as it came out before the Wandsworth Police Court, was a simple one enough. Miss Crosse, being a self-willed young woman of twenty, had formed an attachment for a good-looking lad, two years her junior, who was employed in the vicarage in the double capacity of footman and groom, and who used to attend his young mistress when she went out riding. The attachment was discovered, and the groom, who rejoiced in the plebeian name of George Smith, was sent about his business. The lady, however, who had set her affections on him, was constant to her love. She made an appointment to meet him at midnight, let herself down out of her window, and carried off her lover in triumph, rather, as it seemed, to his own surprise and perplexity. The course of true love—I need not say—was not destined to run smooth. As both parties were under age, they could not obtain a special license from the Registrar; so they had to reside in a village near London for a fortnight till their banns could be read in church for three successive Sundays. Before the allotted period expired, their whereabouts was discovered by the angry father, and the lad, who had been living with Miss Crosse, ostensibly as man and wife, was handed over to the police. The charge, however, broke down on examination; the matter was taken up vigorously by popular papers terribly in want of topics, and the whole affair became so notorious that when the groom was released there was no option left except to marry the youthful couple as fast as might be—an attorney having previously been employed to state in court that throughout the pre-marital period the conduct of the groom had been worthy of Joseph himself.

So all, according to the adage, ended as happily as a marriage bell. The only reason I dwell upon the scandal at all is to point out the intensity of the caste feeling which it illustrates. There was not a tittle of legal evidence to incriminate the prisoner. Years ago—after the elopement, I think, of Gibbon Wakefield with a ward in Chancery—it was made a penal offence to abduct, by fraud or violence, from her home any lady not of age who had an interest in property; and under this statute alone could George Smith, by any possibility, have been arraigned. But, as his part in the elopement was rather that of abductee than abductor, this plea could not be sustained for a moment. Moreover, the moral guilt of the runaway match, whatever it was, attached to the lady rather than the gentleman. She had made the advances and combated the scruples of her somewhat timid swain; and the utmost that can be said against him is that he, a mere boy with no education, had not the resolution to resist the enticements of a pretty woman older than himself in years and ten times older in education and knowledge of the world. His one unpardonable offence was that he was a servant and she was a lady; and this offence was so heinous that the magistrate refused to dismiss the charge at once, though it was utterly unsupported, even on the ex parte statement of the prosecutor; and the father actually pleaded, as an excuse for bringing his daughter's name before the public, that if he had not prosecuted the lad he should not have been able to hold up his head amongst his parishioners.

The truth is, that throughout the whole of English society, down to a very low grade indeed, a marriage between a lady and her servant is felt to be a disgrace. If any of Miss Crosse's male relations had fallen upon George Smith and thrashed him, I doubt if any jury would have convicted them of an assault. The case, naturally enough, made a great deal of talk, and I have frequently heard the topic discussed in the presence of servants; yet, even under these circumstances, everybody treated the marriage as a disgrace which Mr. Crosse and his family had a right to resent. My opinion would be, judging from observation, that marriages between gentlemen and ladies and servants are as rare in this country as marriages between black and white folks are with you, and are viewed with not very dissimilar feelings. Of course, as usual, we make a great difference between the sexes. If a gentleman marries his housemaid, his friends are very angry at first; but society forgives him after a time, and receives his wife after a fashion, if she is presentable, and, above all, rich. But for a lady who marries her manservant there is no social forgiveness. Even wealth could not raise a foot man whose wife was a lady, and had money, into society. Some few years ago the wife of an English member of Parliament ran off with her groom. The lady was a great heiress; and after she had obtained a divorce from her first husband, married her lover. The newly-married couple settled themselves in a part of the country where they were unknown, and lived in great style. But the moment the fact of their history came out, the husband found himself excluded from all society. This was not because he was married to a divorced woman; for this sin he, as a rule, would not have been visited with any social ostracism. Nor was it because he was a self-raised man; his fortune would have made this defect pardonable. It was simply and solely because he, being a groom, had sinned against the laws of caste by becoming the lover of his master's wife. A similar feeling would not apply, or at any rate would only apply in a very modified degree, if the husband, instead of being a servant, had been a laborer or a mechanic. A man who wears powder and plush may be usually as noble a being as the man in corduroys and fustian; but society does not think so. As far as I can explain the extreme aversion with which matches like that made by Miss Crosse are regarded, I should say it was due to an instinct of social self-preservation. Our household life would be impossible if matrimonial relations between the ladies of the house and the serving-men, with whom they are in constant communication, were not almost unknown. Be the explanation what it may, the fact, at any rate, is as I have stated it; and while it remains so, it is clear that what Mr. Ruskin calls "the true nobility of servitude" is not recognized in England.

If you will allow me to wander a little from my subject, I would add that I have often wondered whether the antipathy, so often expressed amongst you, to any intermarriage between blacks and whites is not due quite as much to our Anglo-Saxon feeling that service is degrading as to any innate antipathy to black skins and woolly hair. The natural instincts of Englishmen and Americans are, I think, for the most part, identical; and I see while we have a strong feeling about the degrading character of domestic service, especially for men, we do not seem to me to have any dislike to a black man as black. This subject, I should say, has been lately brought to my attention by a letter from the well-known American correspondent of the Spectator, which has created considerable notice over here. In this letter the writer puts forward, in the strongest manner, the theory that there is an insuperable aversion between the Caucasian and the African races, and repudiates the idea that regard for the negro had anything to do with the war I am sure, if the writer had known the use made of his letter, he would have modified its terms. It has been quoted and commented on by all the newspapers which were most bitter in their advocacy of the South as a justification of their views with regard to the question between Federals and Confederates. Here, they argue, we have unimpeachable testimony from the most ardent of Northerners and pro-Union men that sympathy for the slave had no bearing on the civil war, and that the pretended anti-slavery feeling of the North was a mere imposture. I am quite certain the inference is not consonant with the writer's views, nor is it one that can fairly be drawn from his letter, taken as a whole. But there are passages in it which give too much color to the old pro-slavery advocates; and I think it well to mention the fact, to show how very much harm may be done by inconsiderate writing.

But to come back to my own sheep—which, by the way, are few in number and scant of wool—I have to record that the speaking season has begun in earnest, in defiance of the heat, which still remains unmitigated. The annual extra-Parliamentary gatherings have been delayed as long as possible in the hopes of cooler weather. But the autumn is fast passing away, and newly-elected members cannot venture to decline a meeting with their constituents. Of late years it has become an acknowledged part of a member's duty to deliver an address or read a lecture at the local Athenæum or Mechanics' Institute. To a great many representatives the meeting is, I believe, a real gratification. They are certain to be listened to, reported, and cheered—pieces of good fortune they cannot reckon on in Parliament. There are men who are capital hustings orators, but who have never caught the ear of the House of Commons; and thus being nobodies at Westminster, they are celebrities in the borough for which they sit. Still there are others to whom this annual appearance before their constituents is the most grievous of burdens. Unable to speak a dozen consecutive sentences, they can hold their tongues in the House of Commons, and do so sedulously. But in the local lecture hall they must speak, whether they can or not. Indeed, there are men whose presence in Parliament is a mystery to me and everybody else. I have a friend who has been a member for many years for one constituency. He loves the country, where he has the most charming of seats; he hates London, where he lives in lodgings; and yet he stops half the year in town to attend Parliament. He has not, to my knowledge, ever spoken since he took his seat, except to present a petition. He has bad health, goes to bed at nine, and eschews heated rooms. Yet he will sit till the small hours of the morning waiting wearily, night after night, to record his vote on some subject for which he cares nothing. He has no strong political ideas of any kind—no question with which his name is identified—no personal interest to promote. He is too rich to care about the pecuniary advantages which may be obtained by the fact of membership. And when he goes home to his own country seat he is perpetually pestered with having to deliver addresses, or support resolutions, or take the chair at local meetings, tasks which he dislikes even more than dozing on the benches of St. Stephen's. But somehow the title of M.P. atones for all discomforts.

As yet, there has been nothing in any of the addresses delivered by members out of Parliament to call for especial notice or to indicate the course of political movement in the approaching session. With the exception of Mr. Gladstone, none of the ministers have yet made their autumnal appearance. Lord Palmerston was to have been present at a meeting in Bristol this week; but the meeting was adjourned in consequence of the premier's indisposition. Considerable anxiety is again felt about his health, as he has not rallied during the holidays to the extent that was expected; and rumors are again current that he will not meet the new Parliament as premier. But my own conviction is that he will hold out to the last, and die in harness sooner than resign the power he loves so dearly. Meanwhile, the absence of all political personages from town is clear proof that no immediate apprehension is felt about Lord Palmerston. The Queen has gone back to the Highlands, having passed through England in perfect privacy. It was expected that the Coburg demonstration would bring to a close the system of seclusion adopted since the death of the Prince Consort. However, this seems not to be the case. Tickets had been issued by the authorities of Woolwich for a certain number of ladies and gentlemen to witness the Queen's disembarcation; but when this fact came to the knowledge of the court, orders were issued to call in the tickets and to keep the workmen in the Government dockyards confined to their sheds while the Queen was passing from the landing-place to the train. The stations along the line of travel were kept empty while the royal train passed; and the Queen accomplished her object of reaching Balmoral without being stared at by anybody. The Saturday Review, which owes a good deal of its success to a habit of saying things people like to hear said but do not like saying, has spoken out very freely on the subject, and has said the plain truth, that the country is becoming weary of this exaggerated demonstration of respect for the late Prince Consort. It may seem to you very absurd that grown-up men and women should care whether the Queen shows herself in public or not; and so, abstractly, it is. But, practically, the stability of monarchical institutions in our days depends very much on the personal popularity of the sovereign; and vulgar people have a feeling that, as one of the chief duties of the sovereign is to be the show head of the state, the royal duty is not performed while the monarch hides herself from her subjects. A more reasonable objection to this prolonged privacy is, that the Queen has considerable power in political issues, and that, while she thus shuts herself from the world, she inevitably loses the knowledge of public feeling or derives it from biassed sources. Amongst other rumors current on the subject, it is said that the Queen, of late, has interested herself in spiritualism.

Perhaps you may be surprised that I have made no mention before in this letter of Fenianism. Last night the organ of the Fenians, the Irish People, was seized by the police. The type and machinery were removed, and several persons connected with the paper have been arrested. In no country on the continent would any paper have been allowed to preach open treason and insurrection for so long a time without being suppressed. Still, I cannot but think the confiscation of the Irish People gives an importance to the Fenian movement it did not deserve. However, the loyal classes in Ireland were so indignant at no notice being taken of Fenianism, that it was difficult for the Government to do nothing. As I have before told you, I believe firmly in the existence of very general and deep discontent in Ireland; and I cannot but fear we shall have trouble there before long. But, as far as I can learn, Fenianism itself is more talk than business.

A DAY IN POMPEII.

I.

On the morning after our arrival in Naples, last November, we took the seven o'clock train, which leaves the Nineteenth Century for the first cycle of the Christian Era, and, skirting the waters of the Neapolitan bay almost the whole length of our journey, reached the railway station of Pompeii in an hour. As we rode along by that bluest sea, we saw the fishing-boats go out, and the foamy waves (which it would be an insolent violence to call breakers) come in; we saw the mountains slope their tawny and golden manes caressingly downward to the waters, where the islands were dozing yet; and landward, on the left, we saw Vesuvius, with his brown mantle of ashes drawn close about his throat, reclining on the plain, and smoking a bland and thoughtful morning pipe, of which the silver fumes curled lightly, lightly upward in the sunrise.

We dismounted at the station, walked a few rods eastward through a little cotton-field, and found ourselves at the door of Hotel Diomed, where we took breakfast for a number of sesterces which I am sure it would have made an ancient Pompeian stir up a dust in his urn to think of paying. But in Italy one learns the chief Italian virtue, patience, and we paid our account with the utmost sweetness and good-nature. There was compensation in store for us, and the guide whom we found at the gate leading up the little hill to Pompeii inclined the disturbed balance in favor of our happiness. He was a Roman, spoke Italian that Beatrice might have addressed to Dante, and was numbered Twenty-six. I suppose it is known that the present Italian Government forbids people to be pillaged in any way on its premises, and that the property of the state is no longer the traffic of custodes and their pitiless race. At Pompeii each person pays two francs for admission, and is rigorously forbidden by recurrent sign-boards to offer money to the guides. Ventisei (as we shall call him) himself pointed out one of these notices in English, and did his duty faithfully without asking or receiving fees in money. He was a soldier, like all the other guides, and was a most intelligent, obliging fellow, with a self-respect and dignity worthy of one of our own volunteer soldiers.

Ventisei took us up the winding slope, and led us out of this living world through the Sea-gate of Pompeii back into the dead past—the past which, with all its sensuous beauty and grace, and all its intellectual power, I am not sorry to have dead and, for the most part, buried. Our feet had hardly trodden the lava flagging of the narrow streets when we came in sight of the laborers who were exhuming the inanimate city. They were few in number, not perhaps a score, and they worked tediously, with baskets to carry away the earth from the excavation, boys and girls carrying the baskets, and several athletic old women plying picks, while an overseer sat in a chair near by, and smoked, and directed their exertions. They dig down about eight or ten feet, uncovering the walls and pillars of the houses, and the mason, who is at hand, places little iron rivets in the stucco to prevent its fall where it is weak, while an artist attends to wash and clean the frescoes as fast as they are exposed. The soil through which the excavation first passes is not of great depth; the ashes which fell damp with scalding rain, in the second eruption, are perhaps five feet thick; the rest of the depth is of that porous stone which fell in small fragments in the first eruption. At least two feet of this stone are always left untouched by the laborers till the day when the chief superintendent of the work comes out from Naples to see the last thickness removed; for it is here that the interesting and valuable objects are nearly always found, and it is then that the beautiful mosaic pavements of the houses are uncovered. The wonder was, seeing how slowly the work proceeded, not that two-thirds of Pompeii were yet buried, but that one-third had been exhumed. We left these hopeless toilers, and went down town into the Forum, stepping aside on the way to look into one of the Pompeian Courts of Common Pleas.

II.

Now Pompeii is, in truth, so full of marvel and surprise, that it would be unreasonable to express disappointment with Pompeii in fiction. And yet I cannot help it. An exuberant carelessness of phrase in most writers and talkers who describe it had led me to expect much more than it was possible to find there. In my Pompeii I confess that the houses had no roofs—in fact, the rafters which sustained the tiles being burnt, how could the roofs help falling in? But otherwise my Pompeii was a very complete affair: the walls all rose to their full height; doorways and arches were perfect; the columns were all unbroken and upright; putting roofs on my Pompeii, you might have lived in it very comfortably. The real Pompeii is different. It is seldom that any wall is unbroken; most columns are fragmentary; and though the ground plans are always distinct, very few rooms in the city are perfect in form, and the whole is much more ruinous than I thought.

But this ruin once granted, and the idle disappointment at its greatnes overcome, there is endless material for study, instruction, and delight. It is the revelation of another life, and the utterance of the past is here more perfect than anywhere else in the world. Indeed, I think that the true friend of Pompeii should make it a matter of conscience, on entering the enchanted city, to cast out of his knowledge all the rubbish that has fallen into it from novels and travels, and to keep in his thought merely the facts of the town's luxurious life and agonizing death, with such incidents of the eruption as he can remember from the description of Pliny. These are the spells to which the sorcery yields, and with these in your thought you can rehabilitate the city until Ventisei seems to be a valet de place of the first century, and yourselves a set of blond barbarians to whom he is showing off the splendors of one of the most brilliant towns of the empire of Titus. Those sad furrows in the pavement become vocal with the joyous rattle of chariot-wheels on a sudden, and you prudently step up on the narrow sidewalks and rub along by the little shops of wine, and grain, and oil, with which the thrifty voluptaries of Pompeii flanked their street-doors. The counters of these shops run across their fronts, and are pierced with round holes on the top, through which you see dark depths of oil in the jars below, and not sullen lumps of ashes; those stately amphoræ behind are full of wine, and in the corners are bags of wheat.

"This house, with a shop on either side, whose is it, XXVI.?"

"It is the house of the great Sallust, my masters. Would you like his autograph? I know one of his slaves who would sell it."

You are a good deal stared at, naturally, as you pass by, for people in Pompeii have not much to do, and, besides, a Briton is not an every-day sight there, as he will be one of these centuries. The skins of wild beasts are little worn in Pompeii; and those bold-eyed Roman women think it rather odd that we should like to powder our shaggy heads with brick-dust. However, these are matters of taste. We, for our part, cannot repress a feeling of disgust at all these loungers in the street, who, XXVI. tells us, are going to soak themselves half the day in the baths yonder; for, if there is in Pompeii one thing more offensive than another to our savage sense of propriety, it is the personal cleanliness of the inhabitants. We little know what a change for the better will be wrought in these people with the lapse of time, and that they will yet come to wash themselves but once a year, as we do.

(The reader may go on doing this sort of thing at some length for himself; and may imagine, if he pleases, a boastful conversation among the Pompeians at the baths, in which the barbarians hear how Agricola has broken the backbone of a rebellion in Britain; and in which all the speakers begin their observations with "Ho! my Lepidus!" and "Ha! my Diomed!" In the meantime we return to the present day, and step down the Street of Plenty along with Ventisei.)

III.

It is proper, after seeing the sites of some of the principal temples in Pompeii (such as those of Jupiter and Venus), to cross the fields that cover a great breadth of the buried city, and look into the amphitheatre, where, as everybody knows, the lions had no stomach for Glaucus on the morning of the fatal eruption. These fields are now planted with cotton, and of course we thought those commonplaces about the wonder the Pompeians would feel could they come back to see that New World plant growing above their buried homes. We might have told them, last November, that this cruel plant, so long watered with the tears of slaves, and fed with the blood of men, was now an exile from its native fields, where war was ploughing with sword and shot the guilty land, and rooting up the subtlest fibres of the oppression in which cotton had grown king. And the ghosts of wicked old Pompeii, remembering the manifold sins that called the fires of hell to devour her, and thinking on this exiled plant, the latest witness of God's unforgetting justice, might well have shuddered, through all their shadow, to feel how terribly He destroys the enemies of nature and man.

But the only Pompeian presences which haunted our passage of the cotton-field were certain small with soft black eyes, and graceful ways, who ran before us and plucked the bolls of the cotton and sold them to us. Embassies bearing red and white grapes were also sent out of the cottages to our excellencies; and there was some doubt of the currency of the coin which we gave these poor children in return.

"Phantoms of delight,"

There are now but few peasants living on the land over the head of Pompeii, and the Government allows no sales of real estate to be made except to itself. The people who still dwell here can hardly be said to own their possessions, for they are merely allowed to cultivate the soil. A guard stationed night and day prevents them from making excavations, and they are severely restricted from entering the unburied quarters of the city alone.

The cotton whitens over two-thirds of Pompeii yet interred: happy the generation that lives to learn the wondrous secrets of that sepulchre! For, when you have once been at Pompeii, this phantasm of the past takes deeper hold on your imagination than any living city, and becomes and is the metropolis of your dreamland for ever. O marvelous city! who shall reveal the cunning of your spell? Something not death, something not life—something that is the one when you turn to determine its essence as the other. What is it comes to me at this distance of that which I saw in Pompeii? The narrow and curving, but not crooked streets, with the blazing sun of that Neapolitan November falling into them, or clouding their wheel-worn lava with the black, black shadows of the many-tinted walls; the houses, gay columns of white, yellow, and red; the delicate pavements of mosaic; the skeletons of dusty cisterns and dead fountains; inanimate garden spaces with pigmy statues suited to their littleness; suites of fairy bed-chambers, painted with exquisite frescoes; tiny dining halls with joyous scenes of hunt and banquet on their walls; the ruinous sites of temples; the melancholy emptiness of booths and shops and jolly drinking houses; the lonesome tragic-theatre, with a modern Pompeian drawing water from a well there; the baths with their roofs perfect yet, and the stucco bas-reliefs all but unharmed; around the whole, the wall crowned with slender poplars; outside the gates, the long avenue of tombs, and the Appian Way stretching on to Stabiæ; and, in the distance, Vesuvius, brown and bare, with his fiery breath scarce visible against the cloudless heaven;—these are the things that float before my fancy as I turn back to look at myself walking those enchanted streets, and to wonder if I could have been so blest.

For there is nothing on the earth, or under it, like Pompeii.

The amphitheatre, to which we came now, after our stroll across the cotton-fields, was small, like the vastest things in Pompeii, and had nothing of the stately magnificence of the Arena at Verona, nor anything of the Roman Coliseum's melancholy and ruinous grandeur. But its littleness made it all the more comfortable and social, and, seated upon its benches under a cool awning, one could have almost chatted across the arena with one's friends; could have witnessed the spectacle on the sands without losing a movement of the quick gladiators or an agony of the victim given to the beasts—which must have been very delightful to a Pompeian of companionable habits and fine feelings. It is quite impossible, however, that the bouts described by Bulwer as taking place all at the same time on the arena should really have done so; the combatants would have rolled and tumbled and trampled over each other an hundred times in the narrow space.

Of all the voices with which it once rang the poor little amphitheatre has kept only an echo. But this echo is one of the most perfect ever heard: prompt, clear, startling, it blew back the light chaff we threw to it with amazing vehemence, and almost made us doubt if it were not a direct human utterance. But how was Ventisei to know our names? And there was no one else to call them but ourselves. Our "dolce duca" gathered a nosegay from the crumbling ledges, and sat down in the cool of the once-cruel cells beneath, and put it prettily together for the ladies. When we had wearied ourselves with the echo he arose and led us back into Pompeii.

IV.

The plans of nearly all the houses in the city are alike: the entrance-room next the door; the parlor or drawing-room next that; then the impluvium, or unroofed space in the middle of the house, where the rains were caught and drained into the cistern, and where the household used to come to wash itself, primitively, as at a pump; the little garden, with its painted columns, behind the impluvium, and, at last, the dining-room. There are minute bed-chambers on either side, and, as I said, a shop at one side in front, for the sale of the master's grain, wine, and oil. The pavements of all the houses are of mosaic, which, in the better sort, is very delicate and beautiful, and is found sometimes perfectly uninjured. An exquisite pattern, often repeated, is a ground of tiny cubes of white marble with dots of black dropped regularly into it. Of course there were many picturesque and fanciful designs, of which the best have been removed to the Museum in Naples; but several of these are still left, and (like that of the Wild Boar, in one) give names to the houses in which they are found.

But, after all, the great wonder, the glory, of these Pompeian houses is in their frescoes. If I tried to give an idea of the luxury of color in Pompeii, the most gorgeous adjectives would be as poorly able to reproduce a vivid and glowing sense of those hues as the photography which now copies the drawing of the decorations; so I do not try.

I know it is a cheap and feeble thought, and yet, will the reader please to consider: A workman nearly two thousand years laying upon the walls those soft lines that went to make up fauns and satyrs, nymphs and naiads heroes and gods and goddesses; and getting weary and lying down to sleep, and dreaming of an eruption of the mountain; of the city buried under a fiery hail, and slumbering in its bed of ashes seventeen centuries; then of its being slowly exhumed again, and, after another lapse of years, of some one coming to gather the shadow of that dreamer's work upon a plate of glass, that he might infinitely reproduce it and sell it to tourists at from five francs to fifty centissimi a copy. I say, consider such a dream, dreamed in the hot heart of the day, after certain cups of Vesuvian wine! what a piece of Katzenjämmer (I can use no milder term) would that workman think it when he woke again! Alas! what is history and the progress of the arts and sciences but one long Katzenjämmer?

Photography cannot give, any more than I, the colors of the frescoes, but it can do the drawing better, and, I suspect, the spirit also. I used the word workman, and not artist, in speaking of the decoration of the walls, for in most cases the painter was only an artisan, and did his work probably by the yard, as the artisan who paints walls and ceilings in Italy does at this day. But the old workman did his work much more skilfully and tastefully than the modern—threw on expanses of mellow color, delicately panelled off the places for the scenes, and pencilled in the figures and draperies (there are usually more of the one than the other) with a deft hand. Of course, the houses of the rich were adorned by men of genius; but it is surprising to see the community of thought and feeling in all this work, whether it be from cunninger or clumsier hands. The subjects are nearly always chosen from the fables of the gods, though they are sometimes in illustration of the poets, Homer and the rest. To suit that soft, luxurious life which people led in Pompeii, the themes are commonly amorous and sometimes not too chaste; there is much of Bacchus and Ariadne, much of Venus and Adonis, and Diana bathes a good deal with her nymphs, not to mention frequent representations of the toilet of that beautiful monster which the lascivious art of the time loved to depict. One of the most pleasing of all the scenes is that in one of the houses of the Judgment of Paris, in which the shepherd sits upon a bank in an attitude of ineffable and flattered consequence, with one leg carelessly crossing the other, and both hands resting lightly on his shepherd's crook, while the goddesses before him await his sentence. Naturally the painter has done his best for the vincitrice in this rivalry, and you see as she should be, but with a warm and piquant spice of girlish resentment in her attitude, that Paris should pause for an instant, which is altogether delicious.

"Idalian Aphrodite beautiful"

"And I beheld great Here's angry eyes."

Awful eyes! How did the painter make them? The wonder of all these pagan frescoes is the mystery of the eyes—still, beautiful, unhuman. You cannot feel that it is wrong for those tranquil-eyed men and women to do evil, they look so calm and so abstracted in it all; and in the presence of the celestials, as they bend upon you those eternal orbs, in whose regard you are but a part of space, you feel that here art has achieved the unearthly. I know of no words in literature which give a sense (nothing gives the idea) of the stare of these gods, except that magnificent line of Kingsley's, describing the advance over the sea toward Andromeda of the oblivious and unsympathizing Nereids. They floated slowly up, and their eyes

"Stared on her, silent and still, like the eyes in the house of the idols."

A false art, in the corrupt ages following the apotheosis of painting in Raphael, would have flattered the badness of its time with the reproduction of the pagan spirit; but one has only to look into those awful eyes of the frescoes at Pompeii, and there recall the expression in the faces of the heroes and gods which Giulio Romano, say, has painted in the Palazzo del T, at Mantua, to see how utterly and signally that apostate art has failed. Thank God! since the old creeds perished, it is not in the heart of man to conceive of sin without consequent suffering and shame.

The colors of this fresco of the Judgment of Paris are still so fresh and bright, that it photographs very well, but there are other frescoes wherein there is more visible perfection of line, but in which the colors are so dim that they can only be reproduced by drawings. One of these is the Wounded Adonis cared for by Venus and the Loves: in which the story is treated with a playful pathos wonderfully charming. The fair boy leans in the languor of his hurt toward Venus, who sits utterly disconsolate beside him, while the Cupids busy themselves with such slight surgical offices as Cupids may render: one prepares a linen bandage for the wound, another wraps it round the leg of Adonis, another supports one of his heavy arms, another finds his own emotions too much for him and pauses to weep. It is a pity that the colors of this beautiful fresco are grown so dim, and a greater pity that most of the other frescoes in Pompeii must share its fate, and fade away. The hues are vivid when the walls are first uncovered, and the ashes washed from the pictures, but then the malice of the elements begins anew, and rain and sun draw the life out of tints which the volcano failed to obliterate. In nearly all cases they could be preserved by throwing a roof above the walls, and it is a wonder that the Government does not take this slight trouble to save them.

Amongst the frescoes which told no story but their own, we were most pleased with one in a delicately painted little bed-chamber. This represented an alarmed and furtive man, whom we at once pronounced The Belated Husband, opening a door with a night-latch. Nothing could have been better than this miserable wretch's cowardly haste and cautious noiselessness in applying his key; apprehension sat upon his brow, confusion dwelt in his guilty eye. He had been out till two o'clock in the morning, electioneering for Pansa, the friend of the people ("Pansa, and Roman gladiators," "Pansa, and Christians to the beasts," was the platform), and he had left his placens uxor at home alone with the children, and now within this door that placens uxor awaited him!

V.

You have read, no doubt, of their discovering, a year or two since, in making an excavation in a Pompeian street, the moulds of four human bodies, three women and a man, who fell down, blind and writhing, in the storm of fire eighteen hundred years ago; whose shape the settling and hardening ashes took; whose flesh wasted away, and whose bones lay there in the hollow of the matrix till the cunning of this time found them, and, pouring liquid plaster round the skeletons, clothed them with human form again, and drew them forth into the world once more. There are many things in Pompeii which bring back the gay life of the city, but nothing which so vividly reports the terrible manner of her death as these effigies of the creatures that actually shared it. The man in the last struggle has thrown himself upon his back, and taken his doom sturdily—there is a sublime calm in his rigid figure. The women lie upon their faces, their limbs tossed and distorted, their drapery tangled and heaped about them, and in every fibre you see how hard they die. One presses her face into her handkerchief to draw one last breath unmixed with scalding steam; another's arms are wildly thrown abroad to clutch at help; another's hand is appealingly raised, and on her slight fingers you see the silver hoops with which her poor dead vanity adorned them.

The guide takes you aside from the street into the house where they lie, and a dreadful shadow drops upon your heart as you enter their presence. Without, the hell-storm seems to fall again, and the whole sunny plain to be darkened with its ruin, and the city to send up the tumult of despair.

What is there left in Pompeii to speak of after this? The long street of tombs outside the walls? Those that died before the city's burial seem to have scarcely a claim to the solemnity of death. Shall we go see Diomed's Villa, and walk through the freedman's long underground vaults, where his friends thought to be safe, and were smothered in heaps? The garden-ground grows wild among its broken columns with weeds and poplar saplings; in one of the corridors they sell photographs, on which, if you please, Ventisei has his bottle, or drink-money. So we escape from the doom of the calamity, and so, at last, the severely forbidden buona-mano is paid. A dog may die many deaths besides choking with butter.

We return slowly through the city, where we have spent the whole day, from nine till four o'clock. We linger on the way, imploring Ventisei if there is not something to be seen in this or that house; we make our weariness an excuse for sitting down, and cannot rend ourselves from the bliss of being in Pompeii.

At last we leave its gates, and swear each other to come again many times while in Naples, and never go again.

Perhaps it was as well. You cannot repeat great happiness.

READ WHAT THE PAPERS SAY:

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—This first class monthly for boys and girls is receiving commendatory notices from every part of the Union, and these, too, are from our first-rate newspapers. The following notice is from the Pittsburg Christian Advocate:

"'The first number is the best children's paper, of a high literary tone, that we have ever had the pleasure of reading. If after issues shall fulfil the promise of this avant courier, Chicago will have the honor of making the best child's paper in the nation. We bid a hearty welcome to The Little Corporal and trust it may long live to grace the catalogue of newspaper literature for children.'

"The July, August, and September numbers are before us, and we assure the Pittsburg Advocate and our young readers of the Northwestern that these 'after issues' are fully up to the standard of the first number, and more—they are far beyond it. The Little Corporal is growing in stature, and the muscles of his literary and moral arm are hardening with exercise.

"In plain terms, Mr. Sewell is determined to make his paper a success, and he has secured the services of able writers, for whose productions he pays liberally. We re-echo the words of the Chicago Evening Journal:

"'It is bright, sparkling, and promising, both in typography and contents. It already excels every children's paper that we know of in this country.'

"The periodical looks as if it had been printed by the 'Riverside Press.'—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

"A NEW CHILD'S PAPER.—We have received two copies of The Little Corporal, a monthly paper for children, the publication of which has been commenced at Chicago, Illinois, by Alfred L. Sewell. Judging from these specimens, it is the cleverest thing of its kind yet realized in America. Its whole appearance is in capital taste, and there is evidence in it that its editor has rare tact in catering for the wants of the little ones. The enterprise deserves to be a decided success."—Roxbury [Mass.] Journal, Aug. 5, 1865.

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—Bright, sparkling, and pure; a gem, both in typography and contents. We have been accustomed to think that the West, however she might excel in agricultural products, was far behind the East in literary matters; but we begin to think it is time for the latter to look to her laurels. Certainly we have seen nothing in the shape of a child's paper which could compare with this, which comes to us from over the prairies."—Portland [Maine] Daily Press.

"Judging from the appearance of the two numbers before us, The Little Corporal is destined to become the great children's paper of America.—Forney's Philadelphia Daily Press.

"We have read with great pleasure the first number of this entertaining periodical. We trust The Little Corporal will continue to fulfil the promise of this first number. Will the editor accept our congratulations?"—N. Y. Independent.

"We cannot say too much in favor of this beautiful paper."—Bryan [O.] Union Press.

"The children will be better and happier from reading it."—Henry [Ill.] Courier.

"The Little Corporal really excels any child's paper we have seen. The premium picture is of itself worth a year's subscription."—Sandusky [O.] Reg.

TO MINISTERS THROUGHOUT THE UNITED STATES:

I desire to secure the co-operation of the MINISTERS throughout the country in the furtherance of a work which cannot fail to meet their approval and appreciation.

As editor of THE LITTLE CORPORAL, I hope to induce Ministers to favor the circulation of my paper among their children as a means of doing them good; and I ask each one to send me the name of some intelligent and respectable lady (for whose integrity they can vouch), who will be willing to energetically canvass her own neighborhood for subscribers to THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

Any Minister addressing me, as shown below, will receive by next mail Circulars, showing the opinions of the Press, and will also be informed in relation to the percentage allowed to canvassers.

☞ More than THIRTY YEARS of earnest literary labor have been expended upon this revision of Webster alone—more than in the original preparation of almost any other English Dictionary. It is now believed to be by far the most complete, useful, and satisfactory Dictionary of the language ever published, as it is by far the largest single volume ever issued in any language.

The possession of any other English Dictionary, or any previous edition of this, cannot compensate for the want of this very full and complete one. In its present perfected state, it must long remain the and, once possessed, remain of constant and abiding value.

What book, besides the Bible, so indispensable as a good Dictionary?

WEBSTER'S NEW DICTIONARY.

From Individuals.

From J. H. RAYMOND, LL.D., President of Vassar College.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., Feb. 14, 1865.

THE NEW WEBSTER is glorious—it is perfect—it distances and defies competition—it leaves nothing to be desired. As a monument of literary labor, or as a business enterprise, magnificent in conception and almost faultless in execution, I think it equally admirable—and if you should die to-morrow, you may feel that, so far as earthly honor is concerned, your monument is built.

From Hon. JNO. G. MCMYNN, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, Wisconsin.

MADISON, Nov. 18, 1864.

GREATEST LITERARY WORK OF THE AGE.—So far as I can judge, nothing has been left undone to make this work [the new edition of Webster's Dictionary] worthy of the race, the age, and the language. No nobler national monument has yet been reared than this American Dictionary. I was anticipating the greatest literary work of the age, and it seems to me this anticipation was not extravagant.

From Professor STOWE.

HARTFORD, Conn., June 30, 1865.

There is such an amount and variety of most useful information in your last edition of Webster's Dictionary (not only unabridged, but also greatly enlarged) that I think it deserves a place by the side of the Bible on the parlor-table of every family. The work, as it now stands before the public, is, in many respects, and tracing it from its origin, the greatest literary work which America has ever produced.

From Prof. WILLIAM RUSSELL, the distinguished elocutionist.

LANCASTER, Mass., Feb 14, 1865.

THE NEW "WEBSTER."—The immense and invaluable additions to the original excellence of the Dictionary, the careful retrenchment of whatever errors had been chargeable in former editions, and the just and liberal course adopted in presenting a conspectus of all words on which eminent authorities bespeak a divided usage, whether in orthography or orthoepy; these, together with the unsurpassed accuracy and fulness of the definitions appended to all important terms, in whatever department of knowledge, besides the strict scrutiny to which the whole department of etymology has been subjected, render this new edition of the Dictionary the noblest contribution to science, to literature, and to education as dependent on an adequate knowledge of the English language, that the combined labors of editors and publishers have yet produced.

From J. HAMMOND TRUMBULL, Esq., Secretary of State.

HARTFORD, Conn., Oct. 19, 1864.

Intrinsically and extrinsically it is a satisfying volume. To say nothing of the vocabulary or dictionary proper, I would not hesitate to pay the selling price of the book for its supplements alone.

From E. RYERSON, LL.D., Superintendent of Public Instruction for Upper Canada.

TORONTO, April 6, 1865.

GENTLEMEN: I have received, examined, and for some time used your new illustrated edition of Webster's Dictionary, and, without entering into particulars, I regard it, for reference, as the most comprehensive, the most complete, and the most useful dictionary of the English language—a monument of immense learning and labor, and a noble specimen of art and enterprise on the part of its publishers.

From Rev. N. BATEMAN, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, Illinois.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., June 22, 1865.

It is, in my opinion, without a peer in the English language.

From Prof. EDWARDS, Principal Illinois State University.

NORMAL, Ill., Nov. 18, 1865.

It is really a splendid compilation, creditable alike to the scholarship and business energy that have produced it, and to the nation whose appreciation makes such a princely outlay of money remunerative. Surely never was the genius of a language more magnificently enshrined. It seems enough, of itself, to bestow immortality upon our noble speech.

From Hon. C. R. COBURN, Superintendent of Public Instruction for Pennsylvania.

HARRISBURG, Dec. 9, 1864.

Webster's New Illustrated Unabridged Dictionary is one of the great achievements of this age. This work, as a whole, will be justly considered as the standard for many years to come. In the fulness and accuracy of its definitions, and the naturalness of its illustrations, it stands unrivaled. The improved method of marking the vowels brings out clearly the nice shades of difference that the best speakers give to a few of the vocal elements.

From Deputy State Superintendent BATES, Pennsylvania.

HARRISBURG, Nov. 18, 1865.

The new edition of Webster's Quarto Dictionary is a monument of literary labor which will attract the attention of the learned the world over. It is as charming as the newest novel. I turn over page after page, and know not when to close it. I hope that the day is not far distant when every school in our State will have a copy.

From Prof. HENRY JAMES CLARK, Prof. Zoölogy, Lawrence Scientific Department, Harvard University.

CAMBRIDGE, Nov. 30, 1864.

I have had frequent occasion to use and examine the dictionary with a critical eye and thought, and I have but one word to say in regard to the merits of its definitions in Natural History, and that is, excellent! What otherwise could be expected from the hands or under the direction of Prof. Jas. B. Dana, the highest of our own scientific authorities in matters of zoölogy and geology?

WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY—UNABRIDGED.

From Quarterly and Monthly Journals.

From the "Atlantic Monthly," November, 1864.

From the "New Englander," October, 1864.

By far the most important literary work that has come for years from the American press. . . . We are satisfied that this dictionary, in its present form, is by far the most convenient and valuable manual of reference that has ever been published in the English language.

From the "National Quarterly Review," December, 1864.

From "Harper's Magazine," January, 1865.

Viewed as a whole, we are confident that no other living language has a dictionary which so fully and faithfully sets forth its present condition as this last edition of Webster does that of our written and spoken English tongue.

From the "Evangelical Quarterly Review," January, 1865.

This may be truly regarded as a magnum opus. The present edition is an entire reconstruction of the whole work, a thorough revision in every department, even in the most minute details, and presents in the results the progress which has been made in the study of the language since the first appearance of Webster, more than thirty years ago.

WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY.

From Educational Journals.

This great work is much improved, and will hold its place as the standard work against all opposition.—Vermont School Journal, Nov. 1864.

In our humble opinion, this "latest" of the Dictionaries is, in some important particulars, the "best."—Massachusetts Teacher, Oct. 1864.

Webster's Dictionary has so far distanced all competitors, that it now stands by general consent as the only National Dictionary of our language.—Rhode Island Schoolmaster, Dec. 1864.

This work seems to contain all that the scholar can wish in a dictionary.—Connecticut Common School Journal.

It seems to be as complete and perfect a work as finite skill and wisdom can produce.—Ohio Educational Monthly, Nov. 1864.

The world has furnished but one Federal Constitution, one Bunker Hill Monument, and one Webster's Dictionary, all American; and, so far as mortal ken may penetrate the future, the last is not to be the least, in either duration or glory.—Indiana School Journal, Feb. 1864.

As a whole, this work, we believe, surpasses all others; and we unhesitatingly recommend it to all who wish the BEST Dictionary of the English language.—Iowa Instructor, Jan. 1865.

The City School Board of Boston have just placed (August, 1865) a copy of WEBSTER'S NEW ILLUSTRATED DICTIONARY in each of twenty-one of the principal public schools of that city.

The State of Maryland having recently established a system of free schools for the entire State, its State Board of Education have just adopted WEBSTER'S SERIES OF DICTIONARIES as the standard authority, and to be exclusively used in all the public schools of the State.

Aside from the Bible, it is the most wonderful book in the language; and it contains by far the greatest amount of matter ever put in one volume in any language.—Clark's School Visitor, Jan. 1865.

NEW ILLUSTRATED WEBSTER.

From the Daily and Weekly Press.

It is undoubtedly the foremost work of the kind.—Boston Transcript, Feb. 21, 1865.

It is, altogether, a wonderful work of labor, and is fully up to the times in all its improvements.—American Presbyterian, Philadelphia, Oct. 14, 1864.

As it now stands, we have no doubt this dictionary will be quite generally regarded as the most complete and comprehensive hand-book of the English language in existence.—Watchman and Reflector, Boston, Sept. 29, 1864.

If this work is not a perfect dictionary of the language, it is certainly the nearest approach to that achievement ever yet attained.—Springfield Republican.

By almost universal consent Webster's has ever been regarded as the best defining dictionary in the language. . . . From test comparisons, we are sure no other dictionary extant can give as full and precise an account of all the authorized significations of words.—Portland Press, Oct. 4, 1864.

With the exception, perhaps, of the famous work of the French Academy, no other dictionary ever had such a numerous and able staff of writers employed upon it as this. It is, indeed, a credit to the country.—Forney's Philadelphia Press, Oct. 4, 1864.

We believe all competent judges will say that, on the whole, this edition of Webster is unrivalled.—New York Christian Advocate and Journal, Oct. 20, 1864.

Nearly forty years ago, Noah Webster taught us to spell, and since we got beyond spelling, and learned to read and write, his dictionary has been our constant companion. Nor do we expect to lay it aside until we have no more occasion for such instruments of thought, entering that world where "tongues shall cease."—New York Evangelist, Oct. 20, 1864.

GREATEST ADDITION TO PHILOLOGY IN HALF A CENTURY.—The most important contribution to Philology, during the year 1864, was the publication of the illustrated edition of Webster's Quarto Unabridged Dictionary. This work, which had long been in preparation, and on the revision of which years of labor had been bestowed by several eminent scholars, was, in many respects, the greatest addition to the philology of the present age which has appeared within half a century.—Appleton's Cyclopœdia for 1864.

From a careful and thorough examination of the volume, we do not hesitate to say that in many, if not all respects, it must take precedence of any other dictionary.—Boston Christian Register, Oct. 8, 1864.

It is safe to say that every library should have this book next after the Scriptures.—Philadelphia North American, Oct. 1864.

A vast treasury of knowledge. It is an encyclopœdia in itself, and will doubtless be in the household of every man who can afford to purchase it.—Scientific American, Oct. 15, 1864.

May safely be pronounced the most complete and perfect lexicon of the English language now in existence, or likely to appear within the next score of years.—American Baptist, New York, Oct. 4, 1864.

AGENTS WANTED

FOR

BY ALBERT D. RICHARDSON,

N. Y. Tribune Correspondent.

1,000 COPIES SELLING PER DAY!

The most interesting and exciting book ever published, embracing Mr. Richardson's unparalleled experience for four years. Travelling through the South in the secret service of The Tribune at the outbreak of the war, with our armies and fleets, both East and West, during the first two years of the Rebellion; his thrilling capture; his confinement for twenty months in seven different Rebel prisons; his escape, and almost miraculous journey by night of nearly 400 miles. It abounds in stirring events, and contains more of the fact, incident, and romance of the war than any other work yet published. Horace Greeley says of it:

"A great many books will yet be written concerning this war, in addition to the many already in print; but not one of them will give, within a similar compass, a clearer, fuller, more readable account, entirely from personal observation, of the nature, animus, purposes, tendencies, and instrumentalities of the Slaveholders' Rebellion, than does the unpretending narrative of Mr. Richardson."

Teachers, ladies, energetic young men, and especially returned and disabled officers and soldiers, in want of profitable employment, will find it particularly adapted to their condition. Send for Circulars. Address

THE NEW WEBSTER A NEW WORK.

We have commended this edition warmly already, on the faith of our first examination of it. It has grown upon us in every day's further study. We did not, at first, comprehend how entirely new a work this is, as compared even with the last preceding edition; and how important had been the etymological revision which it has received, making it, for substance, a re-written volume, with all that was admirable and superior in the previous contributions of a generation to its pages preserved and augmented by a thorough concentration upon it of the best skill and widest research of the present. As it stands—in its etymologies, in its definitions, in its synonyms, and in its (real) illustrations—it is far in advance of any other manual which offers itself to the aid of the student of the multifarious wealth of the composite English tongue.

It is not a sectarian dictionary. We do most sincerely believe that all sects will find their especial phrases of faith more exactly and fairly and fully given in Webster than in any or all others put together.—Boston Congregationalist.

DAVID WOODBURN,

MOUNTAIN MISSIONARY.

The scenes recorded in this volume have their unfolding in the wild and semi-civilized regions of the "Blue Ridge," in Western Virginia, and are a faithful record of individual experience.

"DAVID WOODBURN" had his birth and home in these mountain seclusions, and the history and abounding labors of this untaught youth form the main features of the work. While yet a rude and unlettered boy, he became a colporteur of the American Tract Society of New York for the "Mountains," and it is no exaggeration to say that the Society, in its widely extended and valuable labors, has never employed a worker of such tireless activity, or one on whom the divine blessing so manifestly rested. To give in this advertisement even a synopsis of his missionary toils and successes, would be to copy out the book itself. The publisher prefers to furnish the work in a handsomely bound and beautifully illustrated volume, at moderate cost, to those who are in sympathy with the noblest enterprise in which a Christian association can engage. Six illustrations. Price $1 25.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

THERE is fine reading for those who love the twilight territory between fact and fiction, haunted by dim shapes and weird imagery, in a book just published in London, "The Literature and Curiosities of Dreams." It has no pretensions to be considered a scientific work, like Dr. MacNish's "Philosophy of Sleep," but is rather, as described in the title, "A Commonplace Book of Speculations concerning the Mystery of Dreams and Visions, Records of Curious and Well-authenticated Dreams, and Notes on the Various Modes of Interpretation adopted in Ancient and Modern Times." The name given as that of the author, "Frank Seafield, M.A.," has rather a fictitious look. But whoever it may be, he has well ransacked the bye-paths of literature that contain anything relating to the subject, and his list of authorities ranges from Artemidorus and Zoroaster to Dr. Dunglison and Mrs. Sigourney. In the large collection of relations of "Dreams, Ancient and Modern," it is curious to see how their shadowy testimony has been brought to bear upon important questions of human interest in all the professions—law, medicine, and divinity—and how many names of men remarkable for anything rather than an excess of credulity are connected with these speculations. The work forms two volumes, post octavo but is too dear in its English dress for general circulation. The interest of the topic would probably carry off a reprint.

—The Photo-zincographic process, by which photographic copies of any description are susceptible of being printed from like engraved plates, is now being applied very extensively in England for the popularization of records, autographs, etc., where actual identity, and not merely resemblance, between the original and the duplicate is desirable. It was first made use of in connection with the drawings and details of the Ordnance Survey, and was so successful that it is now extended to most cases where copies of papers are required, instead of having them done by hand. A fac-simile of the whole of the great national territorial record, the "Doomsday Book" of William the Conqueror, has been completed, and is sold in separate counties at a moderate price. It has been followed by a volume of "National Documents from William the Conqueror to Queen Anne," selected from the originals at the Public Record Office, of the very first rank in point of historical interest. Here will be found, accompanied by literal translations, etc., autographs of each sovereign, the original "Magna Charta" from the most perfect copy known, the famous "Ragman Roll," or roll of homage done to Edward I. by the Scots, the letter from Richard III. to his Chancellor, vowing the destruction of Buckingham, and other curious illustrations of English history and the English historical drama. The private instructions of the envoys sent by Henry VII. to gain information of his intended bride, the young Queen of Naples, are especially singular; the shortest one we can find which will give a sample of the rest is: "Item—to note the clerenesse of hir skynne, As to thys article, the saide Quyn ys verry fayre and clere of skynne, as farre as that we coude persayve by hir vysage, necke and hands, the whiche we saw and well persayved." The "colour of hir here"—"hir ies browes, tethe and lippes," and a vast number of other details, are among the matters that the royal bridegroom expectant desired full information on, and the answers given are as naïve as the questions.

—We hear unexpectedly of a new association for the study of American antiquities, which seem to occupy the learned world as fully as the recent affairs of this continent have engaged the attention of statesmen and politicians. It is entitled "Le Comité d'Archéologie Américaine de France." The names of its founders, etc., are not given, but it is stated that a deputation of its members recently visited London for the twofold purpose of conferring with the students of American history and antiquities residing in that capital, and "of searching in the public and private collections of that metropolis for documents relating to the history of America before its discovery by Columbus." What kind of "documents" the deputation expected to find that had escaped previous scrutiny is not stated, and the whole account would seem rather to be founded on some private crotchet than on the proceedings of a learned society, except that the respectable names of Mr. N. Trübner and Mr. W. Bollaert (both known for their writings on America) are mentioned as representatives of England on the committee. A meeting was held in London on August 17, when papers were read on the studies of the society by M. de Labarthe, and by M. Leon de Rosny on the late progress of American archæological research. We wait for further particulars respecting this new learned organization.

—One of the treasures of Lord Charlemont's library, lately dispersed at auction in London, was a copy of the "Orlando Furioso" of Ariosto, the first complete edition of the whole forty-six cantos, printed at Ferrara in 1532. It was printed on vellum, one of the five copies known to be executed on that material, and it was stated in a contemporary handwriting to be the gift of the author himself to the Signora Veronica Gambera, a lady mentioned by Ariosto in the last canto of the poem. The Italian bibliographer Count Melzi mentions that Lord Spencer had offered in vain one hundred guineas for a similar copy of this edition, but being unable to procure one on vellum, was obliged to put up with one on large and thick paper. On the 10th of last month the copy above mentioned brought £135. The editions of Ariosto's romantic poem in Italy are just equal in number to the various impressions of Shakespeare's works in England, about 400 different impressions being recorded of each, only with this remarkable dissimilarity: in the sixteenth century, within seventy years of its first publication, the number of editions of the "Orlando" was 166, while in the same space of time after the appearance of the collected edition of Shakespeare's plays four editions only were needed. It is one of the peculiarities of the bibliomania, that while the early editions of Dante, Petrarch, and Ariosto are among the choicest, dearest, and most sought-for of books, and volumes have been written on the peculiarities of each, those of Tasso have never been in any demand, and remain perhaps "rare," but not at all recherché. It requires that these two elements of value should meet in a book to make it of high value, and the concurrence of two or three amateurs and collectors of the "Jerusalem Delivered" would soon (according to Burnet) place Tasso on the same bibliographical eminence occupied by his older poetical brethren.

—A question of some importance respecting the law of copyright has been well examined by Mr. George Ticknor Curtis, whose report, based on the common-sense view of the subject, rather than on technicalities, is a good specimen of what we all imagine law should be. It arose from the fact that Messrs. Bunce & Huntington, of New York, had included in a small volume of selections entitled "Home Ballads by our Home Poets" several poems by Longfellow, Dr. Holmes, J. R. Lowell, J. G. Saxe, etc., all of which were either owned by or farmed out to Messrs. Ticknor & Fields. The proceedings were not taken vindictively, but simply to ascertain the state of the law. Mr. Curtis's opinion is well worth reading; it may be found in the "American Publishers' Circular" for Sept. 15. He disposes satisfactorily of the various pleas offered in justification therefor—that the pieces had passed into the common literature of the country, that the license of fair quotation or liberty of criticism allowed a certain freedom of appropriation, etc., and proves that a book, when original in its contents, and duly entered for copyright, is, the whole and every part of it, under protection of the statute, and that when a portion of a work is taken, not for the purpose of commenting on or illustrating it, but for the purpose of making it the subject-matter of sale in itself, the copyright law is unquestionably violated, and may be applied to for redress, in proportion to the damage and injury sustained by the real owner of the property.

—Among other publishers of England and Scotland who are seeking a market in the United States is the house of Alexander Strahan, which has been raised to sudden eminence by the immense success of the two periodicals, "Good Words" and the "Sunday Magazine," established by them a few years since. The circulation of the former is now about 180,000 of the weekly and monthly numbers, and of the latter 100,000. They began with merely a local circulation in Scotland, but the excellence of the literary matter, and the eminence of the authors engaged, has carried them wherever the English language is spoken. Among their contributors are Drs. Guthrie and McLeod, Dean Alford, Dr. Stanley, Alexander Smith, and many others of equal renown, whose appearance in periodical literature was an unusual phenomenon. The number of subscribers in this country has been hitherto limited, by the war and other circumstances, to about 1,500 copies of each magazine, but through an agency that he has just established the publisher hopes, by making them more easily accessible, to give them a currency here more in proportion to the merit and cheapness of the publications, which admirably fit them for a wide circulation.

—The autumn announcements of the new and active house of Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, of Broadway, indicate nearly forty separate publications, all intended to appear before Christmas, and many of them, by their character, specially adapted for that season and the offices of kindly beneficence called forth annually by its time-honored associations. Among them are a new and elegant edition of that charming story, "Picciola," by Xaintine, translated from the author's revised edition, with illustrations on wood by Leopold Flammeng, and ornamental head and tail pieces; "The Twenty-third Psalm," illuminated and printed in oil colors; "Alice Cary's Poems," illustrated by the first artists of the day; a fine edition of that classic for all time, "The Fables of Æsop," illustrated with one hundred and eleven engravings from original designs by Herrick; "The Three Kings of Orient," a Christmas carol by Rev. J. H. Hopkins, illuminated in colors; and Mrs. Barbauld's "Hymns for Children," beautifully embellished with engravings on wood by English artists, an edition published in London by John Murray, and in New York by Messrs. Hurd & Houghton. The more general literary announcements include "Rejected Addresses, and other Poems," by James and Horace Smith, edited by Epes Sargent; "Canterbury Tales," by Harriet and Sophia Lee (the book from which Lord Byron borrowed his drama of "Werner"), in three vols. crown 8vo; "Letters of Mozart," translated by Lady Wallace; a "Brief Biographical Dictionary," on a new plan, which forms in England one of the popular "Golden Treasury Series;" "The Life and Character of J. A. Van der Palm, D.D., Professor in the University of Leyden," translated by Dr. Westerveldt; and "The Dutch Pilgrim Fathers, and other Poems," by Edward Hopper. It is principally, however, in juvenile literature that Messrs. Hurd & Houghton put out their full strength. In this branch their forthcoming books are far too numerous to mention, and we must content ourselves with particularizing "The Children in the Wood," told in verse by R. H. Stoddard, splendidly illustrated and printed in colors, with illuminated cover, like the highly popular "Little Red Riding Hood," which was the "gem of the season" for young folks last year.

—Mr. J. Heneage Jesse, whose pleasant volumes relating to the Stuart and Hanoverian courts of England are the best specimens we have that answer to the popular French semi-historical and biographical memoirs, has in press a new book, "Memoirs of George the Third and his Times." It is said to be enriched with many curious anecdotes from unpublished documents of the noble families of the time, and, in connection with his former works, will bring down the thread of narrative from James I. to the days of our fathers and the early remembrances of those yet flourishing among us. The "Memoirs" will form three volumes 8vo, and will be published by Messrs. Tinsley Brothers.

—One of the late volumes issued by the Anthropological Society of London is a collection of the treatises by the famous anatomist and naturalist, Blumenbach, on the scientific study of man. Though his work on the "Natural Varieties of Man" was published ninety years ago, and has in many particulars been superseded, it will always be a landmark in the progress of the knowledge of the race, and therefore well deserved to be put in an English dress more generally acceptable than the original Latin form. To him is due the classification or division of mankind into races now usually followed, and his collection of skulls (or "Golgotha," as he called it) was the first ever formed with a view to the physical illustration of the varieties of intellectual development and natural affinities of the various families of man. A memoir by his friend and pupil, Dr. Marx, relates how early his favorite pursuits began to engross him; how his native town of Gotha possessed only one skeleton, in the possession of a doctor; how young Blumenbach found it impossible to resist its fascination, and secretly began a collection of bones of animals to compose a copy, until his hoard was accidentally discovered, to the intense discomposure of the surprised household. A story testifying to the pre-occupation in his studies that usually characterizes great discoverers is told of him during his visit to England. Being entertained in London by all the English professors, on one evening they went to the theatre to see John Kemble in "Othello." Some days after the actor met the anatomist at a party, and said, "M. Blumenbach, how did you think I succeeded in representing the character of a negro?" "Well enough," said the naturalist, "for the morale; but" (he added) "all the illusion was destroyed for me the moment you opened your hand, for you had on black gloves, and the inside of the negro's hand is of a flesh color." Every one laughed except Blumenbach; he had spoken quite seriously. By this it seems that Mr. Crummles' famous typical example of earnestness—the man "who blacked himself all over when he played 'Othello'"—exhibited more zeal than knowledge in his devotion to the couleur locale. Blumenbach was born in 1752, and was among us enjoying an honored old age so recently as 1840.

—It is a significant instance of the vitality of a real work of genius, in spite of all the encumbrances of antiquated form and obsolete manner, that Richardson's "Clarissa Harlowe" should appear in the collection of light reading (the Tauchnitz series of English novels recently mentioned) alongside of Miss Braddon, G. A. Sala, Anthony Trollope, and the latest followers of the last "sweet thing," not in millinery, but in the literature of fiction. Such is the case, however, and the book that has not met with an edition in its own country for half a century past re-appears in four of the well-known straw-colored volumes that slip so readily into the corners of the trunk of the European continental traveller.

—The search by an author for an available subject, rather than any peculiar fitness for the task, has apparently led to a "Memoir of the Life and Writings of Sir Richard Steele" by H. R. Montgomery, a man of no known status in contemporary literature. Steele undoubtedly well deserved a biographer—it is, in fact, an opprobrium to English literature that no collected edition of his writings has appeared, though most of the heavy work necessary for its accomplishment has been done by the indefatigable John Nichols—but the author of his life should, by original research, be able to increase our existing stock of information respecting the man and his times. Such, by account of the critics, does not seem to be within the achievement of Mr. Montgomery, and his two large octavos are pieced out with well-worn fragments of the general history and biography of the eighteenth century. For a long period Sir Richard Steele was so completely eclipsed by the more courtly graces and faultless moral demeanor of his friend Addison, that no one thought of examining into the real character of one of the most genial of English writers. Latterly, however, there has been a disposition to bring him forward—like Macaulay for a foil, or like Thackeray for a rival and a counterpoise—to the indisputable classic, with whom it was the highest pride of his true and loyal nature to be associated in life and in death. The accidental publication of his Private Correspondence with his wife gives us, in the words of Thackeray, "some of the most curious memoranda that ever were left of a man's biography; they have all the genuineness of conversation, are as artless as a child's prattle, and as confidential as a curtain lecture." Altogether, though this last attempt to do him justice does not seem perfectly satisfactory, Steele may be considered as a recovered figure in the English literary Pantheon, and tardy justice is being done to both the man and the author.

—The courage that deserves success, if not the merit that commands it, is unquestionably the attribute of Mr. M. F. Tupper. A serious five-act play, by the "Proverbial Philosopher," to be brought out at the Haymarket Theatre, was the "coming event" of the last week's dramatic annals in London, and, with singular absence of reticence, it was stated to have been originally produced in Manchester a few years since without success. If, in spite of such a forewarning, Mr. Tupper gains a favorable verdict from the public, he will be a fortunate man; but the author whose books have been bought by some two hundred thousand purchasers, must enjoy a solid sense of satisfaction proof against many trifling annoyances. His play is entitled "Alfred." We notice by the book lists that he has changed his publisher, and has joined in the "nest of singing birds" whose notes echo from Messrs. Moxon's establishment, instead of continuing with Messrs. Hatchard, of "serious" fame, by whom his books were first given to the world.

—The Berlin Society for the Study of Modern Languages offers two prizes, to be given next year, for the best paper on the following theses—both rather singularly relating to one subject—the inexhaustible dramatist: First, The influence of Shakespeare on the development of the English language, giving an account of the state of poetic language in England during the literary period immediately preceding that of Shakespeare—proofs of the development in his poetry—a philological comparison between him and his contemporaries and subsequent writers. Second, History of the criticism of Shakespearian dramas by the German and Romanic nations. The competing theses may be in German, English, or French, and must be sent in by the 1st of next July. The prize of the first is 500 thalers in gold, of the second 200.

—Though late in the field, the Spanish Government is contributing its quota to the knowledge of the early history of America. Whatever has been done in that direction by Navarette, Pascal de Gayangos, and other scholars, has been effected through private enterprise; but the work to be mentioned has been declared by royal order to be of public utility, and it appears under the sanction of the court. It is a "Collection of Inedited Documents on the Discovery, Conquest, and Colonization of the Spanish Possessions beyond the Sea, drawn from the Royal Archives of the Indies." The editor is Duc Luis Torrez di Mendoza, and it is proposed to issue two volumes annually.

—Dr. Pusey, whose "Lectures on the Prophet Daniel" have been received by all parties and denominations of Christians as a noble vindication of revealed truth, quits temporarily the paths of Scriptural exegesis for the more exciting themes of polemic warfare. He has now in press a "Reply" to the letter recently addressed to him by Archbishop Manning on behalf of Anglo Romanism. It is expected to form a work as remarkable as Dr. Newman's "Apology" for his own life, and will vindicate and defend the catholicity of the English Church while explaining the position and policy of the writer, whose influence on a numerous and devoted band of followers more resembles what we read of in the ages of faith than the ordinary relations of a modern Protestant clergyman to the community. To avoid the appearance of personal controversy with the Roman Catholic archbishop, Dr. Pusey's letter will be addressed formally to Rev. J. Keble.

THE CONVERSION OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.*

No one will question the truth of the first sentence of Mr. Merivale's book. He says: "The conversion of the Roman Empire to Christianity is a very comprehensive subject of enquiry." Most comprehensive! and, let us add, very difficult adequately to know and to describe. A most remarkable transformation in the religious beliefs and habits of the civilized world took place at least fifteen hundred years ago. Old creeds were repudiated, old deities were dethroned; a new creed, not of Roman origin, was accepted; a new worship was established, and the law by which men thenceforth understood their relations to God, and God's relations to them, was drawn from the sacred Scriptures and creed of the Catholic Church.

To show, at least in part, how this immense revolution was effected, what preparations for it had been going on for centuries previous, what processes the mind of the world went through, how it emerged from its old heathen cultus into the broad catholic truth, is the purpose of Mr. Merivale's book. We propose here to give some account of it—to inform our readers what the author has said, rather than what he might have said, or what we should have said.

Before we do this, however, we ask permission to consider for a moment the fragmentary character of the written histories of the "Eternal City." There is something wonderful in them—they are in a measure the reflex not only of the greatness, but of the manifold, huge life of the power whose ghost still walks upon the seven hills. No one man has been able to write the history of Rome; no one man has been able to know it more than in part. It is too great to pass in full, complete review before any single life. The parts gathered by many hands remain yet to be constructed into one living, organic whole. Gibbon's work must for ever remain what Niebuhr called it—"a noble masterpiece;" yet Gibbon's work begins at a period long after the "mightiest Julius" had inaugurated a new era for the Roman people and commonwealth. Niebuhr himself, though he had all knowledge, has not portrayed Rome. Arnold, following the leadership of the great German, has written, as far as it goes, a charming piece of history—but still incomplete. Mr. Merivale has given us another period of Roman history—only a period; and in this new work, upon the great subject of the conversion of the empire to Christianity, has written with more breadth and depth than any one who has written of it in English. Each book, and the same is true of

* "The Conversion of the Roman Empire. The Boyle Lectures for the year 1864, delivered at the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, by Charles Merivale, B.D., Rector of Lawford, Chaplain to the Speaker of the House of Commons, author of a 'History of the Romans under the Empire.'" New York: D. Appleton & Co., 443 and 445 Broadway. 1865.

German and French works which treat of laws, manners, customs, though it may be complete in itself, yet, viewed in relation to the history of Rome, is a fragment, a contribution to the great sum total not yet in hand. Perhaps that complete history will never be accomplished until Rome herself shall have finished her course, and lie buried in her own grave by the Tiber.

The form of Mr. Merivale's book is not, we confess, to our taste. The foundation lectureships in England, such as the Boyle, the Bampton, and the Hulsean, have created a peculiar kind of literature to be found nowhere else. These lectures have been written and preached by clergymen of the Church of England, and they embrace now, in the aggregate, hundreds of volumes, and discuss all topics which bear nearly or remotely upon religion. In some respects, and for some classes of subjects, such as ethics, this form of composition does very well, but it is clumsy and ill-suited to critical subjects and to histories. Much that is of real value is collected in notes at the end of the volume, because it cannot be used in the text, while the text itself has not the merit belonging to the best style of pulpit composition, nor the dramatic power of free historic composition, nor the incisive vigor of the review article. For such purposes, then, these lectures are apt to be too learned to be popular, and not learned or exact enough to meet the demands of the scientific reader.

These observations, in a measure, must be applied to Mr. Merivale's work, which is the Boyle Lecture for the year 1864. It is a series of sermons preached in the Chapel Royal—each lecture having its text, which is used as a sort of motto, and partaking somewhat of the character of a "pulpit performance." Mr. Merivale himself evidently felt the awkwardness of the undertaking, as may be seen from a paragraph in the first lecture, p. 22.

The preface is an integral part of the work, and must be read if we wish to know the author's view of the way in which Christianity triumphed over the old religions of the world. Gibbon's famous fifteenth chapter, which brought down upon him a storm of indignation, is at once suggested to the reader. Gibbon, it will be recollected, named five causes which, in his judgment, accounted for the success of the Christian religion; he called them, with an ill-concealed sarcasm, "the secondary causes," and they are as follows: 1. The inflexible and, if we may use the expression, the intolerant zeal of the Christians, derived, it is true, from the Jewish religion, but purified from the narrow and unsocial spirit which, instead of inviting, had deterred the Gentiles from embracing the law of Moses. 2. The doctrine of a future life, improved by every additional circumstance which could give weight and efficacy to that important truth. 3. The miraculous powers ascribed to the primitive Church. 4. The pure and austere morals of the Christians. 5. The union and discipline of the Christian republic. Mr. Merivale names "four ways" in which the conversion of the empire was effected: 1. "By the force of the external evidence to the truth of Christianity, by the apparent fulfilment of recorded prophecy, and by the historical testimony to the miracles," etc. He declares, however, that this argument, as conducted, had but little intrinsic force, its power, in fact, being the result of "the great proneness of the age to accept the claims of miracles." 2. "Internal evidence," from the sense of spiritual destitution, the consciousness of sin, and the acknowledged need of a sanctifier and redeemer. 3. "The godly examples of the Christians throughout the trials of life, and especially in the crowning trial of martyrdom, were, as we may be assured from history, productive of thousands, nay, of millions, of conversions." 4. "But among the multitude there was probably after all no argument so effectual, no testimony to the divine authority of the Gospel so convincing, as that from the temporal success with which Christianity was crowned."

These are Mr. Merivale's four points, briefly stated but not fully argued, nor elaborately unfolded, as Gibbon's five causes. Undoubtedly, it is well to weigh Merivale's as it is well to weigh Gibbon's estimate. We shall find much truth in both, though not the whole truth in either. Mr. Merivale has touched the matter rather daintily, as if he had no time to enter into any possible controversy upon the subject. He sketches the great fact, he points to the sources of the power which secured for the Gospel its triumphs and victories, but he does not carry the reader back into the world when it was, to human eyes at least, a matter of doubt whether the new religion would be crushed, or whether it would lead captive the governing spirit of mankind. We do not see the conflict; we behold here and everywhere in Mr. Merivale's pages striking contrasts, results, and the unconscious preparation for those results, in the forms which the later civilization assumed in its laws and ideas, both religious and social.

In fact, we find here what is most characteristic, as well as excellent and interesting, in this book. In the first lecture we see all the strong points in our author's treatment of his subject. The topic itself is extremely interesting to a modern man, and it is well handled by Mr. Merivale. He is strong in contrasts. In order to show the immense difference between the ideas prevalent in the heathen world before the Gospel, and the ideas brought in with its triumphs, he draws two pictures—first, of a séance of the old Roman Senate; and, secondly, of the first general council of the Christian Church. It will not be out of place to dwell upon this contrast.

"On the fifth of December, B.C. 63, the Roman Senate was assembled at the Temple of Concord to discuss, amid profound public agitation, the punishment to be inflicted upon the Catilinian conspirators. Men distinguished in the arts of war and of peace, warriors and legislators, patriots and demagogues, leaders and partizans, orators and mere dumb but faithful voters, well-educated men, trained in the philosophies of the day and accustomed to weigh grave problems of life and of death, were gathered together to deliberate upon matters of the greatest moment to the fortunes of the republic. Before that audience, Caius Julius Cæsar gave utterance to the following opinion: 'In pain and misery death is the release from all suffering, not suffering itself; death dissolves all the ills of mortality; beyond it is no place either for pain or pleasure. Wherefore, keep these criminals alive, to suffer a fitting penalty; after death there is no more punishment for sin, neither is there any reward for virtue.' Cæsar was supreme pontiff, 'the chosen interpreter of divine things to the national conscience,' and yet he makes deliberate denial, publicly, of immortality—and, what is equally noticeable, this denial occasioned no special comment, met with no rebuke, laid Cæsar open to no charge—did not, as far as we know, disturb the mind of any person who heard it; and amongst the men who heard it was Cato himself, the very embodiment of the noblest type of Roman morality. It gave him no shock, for the question of immortality was a question for the schools—a problematical question. The belief in it did not enter into the motives and conduct of every-day life. A person might believe, he might disbelieve it; but neither belief nor disbelief entered into the composition of his morality. In a word, religion, such as it was at Rome then, had nothing to do with the question of the immortality of the soul."

Now, by way of contrast, in order to show the magnitude of the revolution involved in the conversion of the empire, Mr. Merivale introduces us to a new scene—places before us the first general council of the Catholic Church. The Roman Senate in the days of Julius Cæsar, and the first council of the Catholic Church in the days of Constantine! In time, measured by years, not quite four centuries had gone; in reality, the change is most difficult to compute. The Roman Senate still existed in form, but the power to control the minds and actions of man was then in the process of transfer to the Catholic Church, under the patronage and by the aid of the emperor. "The matter of debate," says Mr. Merivale, "in the assembly to which the gravest affair of state is now committed is not a question of political emergency, of foreign levy, or domestic treason, but of the deepest spiritual significance,—the Council of Nice is met together to fix the creed of Christendom on a point of religious dogma, to close up an intellectual schism, and settle the faith of men on an everlasting foundation." And who composed this extraordinary council? "One sacred oratory," says Eusebius, "enlarged as it were by God himself, enclosed within its walls both Syrians and Cilicians, Phœnicians and Arabians, Palestinians and Egyptians; also, Thebæans and Libyans, and those that came forth of Mesopotamia. There was present, also, at this synod a Persian bishop; neither was the Scythian absent from the quire. Moreover, there appeared here Thracians and Macedonians, Achaians and Epirotes, and such as dwelt far beyond these met, nevertheless, together." It is not necessary to state how much faith in the immortality of the soul had to do with the religion of these men, how it affected their hopes, their fears, their whole conception of the moral duties of life. The sphere of ideas in which they lived was unknown to the Cæsars, the Catos, and the Ciceros of a past age.

Here is the grand fact, a religion which makes the utmost practical use of faith in the soul's immortality—the church, once so poor, so despised, so persecuted, has become the religion of the world and wears the imperial purple. How this change was brought about requires a long story, which Mr. Merivale does not tell. He tells us how the story may be learned. He goes back, and indicates here and there the path of enquiry to be followed, and the line of development which actually was followed by the world before it became Christian. He develops very admirably several important facts, which touch the heart of the matter, and so brings to light the preparation which the world had been undergoing for centuries for the final reception of a Catholic truth and a Catholic religion. He finds the preparation, which was, in fact, an "education of the world," in the following particulars: In the gradual change which took place in the heathen conception of religion; in the later religious efforts of the leaders of opinion; in the influence of the Macedonian Empire upon the civilization of the world; and also in the character and breadth of Roman jurisprudence. We cannot, of course, here undertake to follow our author in the details of his treatment of the subject.

He displays critical acumen and a philosophic temper, while his style is very clear and occasionally is beautiful.

There are two topics, however, to which we must refer, on account of their intrinsic interest, and because they exhibit fairly the spirit in which Mr. Merivale has pursued his inquiries and studies. These are the growth of religious sentiment in the world, and the influence of the Macedonian Empire upon the world's civilization.

Mr. Merivale then dwells with considerable emphasis upon the fact that religion to a Roman at the time of Julius Cæsar, and for some time subsequently, meant a sort of devotion to the genius of the city—to the Fortune of Rome. It did not mean a power in the heart affecting the life from anything like allegiance to or fear of an invisible Lord. It was a sort of political obligation to the state; it was part of the duty of a true citizen. The well-being of the state was the hinge upon which religious rites and usages turned. Religion in this view was a national, not a personal, covenant with God. "The piety of the Romans looked backward; its ideal lay behind it, not before it. It aspired to present safety or enjoyment by a faithful imitation of an imaginary past, but it had no standard of future excellence or future blessedness to attain unto, no rising star to follow, no expansion, no development to anticipate." But such a view of religion was essentially weak, and could not withstand the revolutions which slowly but surely take place in society or in the conduct of a great state. It was found by experience to be weak, and the minds of men yearned for a broader truth and for personal fellowship with God. Mr. Merivale has pointed out the steps by which a great change was effected, by which men strove to approach the Deity, to know Him, and to keep in their hearts a sense of his presence. Clearly this was an unconscious move or change of base by which the world became educated to listen to the teachings of the Christians. At this point the Christian teachers alone, with their positive objective faith, could go forward and onward, and carry the world with them. How touching, how despairing, how tragic life and death seemed to men at this juncture, is finely exhibited by Mr. Merivale in his fifth and sixth lectures, and to them we must refer our readers.

But the influence of the Macedonian Empire in giving greater breadth to the world's civilization is a fact which the modern mind is learning gradually. Alexander, before history became a truly critical study, was looked upon as a sort of royal raider, who, followed by his steel-clad phalanxes, went through Asia like a line of fire. He is, however, now no longer considered a rollicking king, fighting for his own amusement. Even Dr. Pusey, in his late learned book on the Prophet Daniel, speaks of him as "perhaps the most intellectually-minded conqueror the world ever saw." He was, we think, the most far-sighted man ever devoted to the art and excitement of war. We wish Mr. Merivale had written a line in genuine appreciation of his talent and political sagacity. Modern criticism will recognize his claim to the title by which he has so long been known. He must for ever remain in history—Alexander the Great.

He founded, really, the Macedonian Empire. This empire carried Grecian literature, philosophy, and manners over into Asia and Egypt. Grecian life became incorporated into the life of races which Greek philosophers had named barbarian. The Greek language was disseminated, and with it the type of civilization to which Greece had given birth. We may say it became universal; it was to the world at the incoming of the Gospel what the French tongue was to Europe at the beginning of this present century. Men everywhere were familiar with it. Common ideas were generated by means of a common speech. While national life was declining, the intercourse of men and of races with each other increased constantly under the imperial dominion of Rome. Asia and Europe were made one in the sphere of ideas and culture, and thus, where the Gospel was preached, it found in the Greek language an instrument which could be employed from Jerusalem itself to the pillars of Hercules. The Macedonian Empire, in this view, may be fairly considered as one step in the education of the world, fitting it finally for the reception of Christianity. This subject is well treated by our author, though not amply. He draws the outline. He shows, too, how the broad civilization carried away the speculations of Aristotle respecting the relations of superior to inferior races. It is odd, in passing, to consider that the more subtle advocates of African slavery upon this continent never could rise above the formulas of Aristotle. They always reasoned like heathens upon the subject, never apparently being able to comprehend the new law and the new commandment taught mankind in the New Testament. For this, however, and for the influence of Roman jurisprudence in preparing the way for the conversion of the empire, our readers must turn to Mr. Merivale's pages. He will suggest to thoughtful men much which it becomes them to weigh in these days of revolution. Changes come in due time—the race moves onward; but its march cannot be hastened beyond the ordinance of Him who governs now, as he governed two thousand, three thousand, yes, as He has governed during the years past which are beyond our computation.

Mr. Merivale would have done well had he shown in his charming book how heathenism in its lingering death influenced Christianity. In the conflict between the new and old, if the new conquer, the old in some of its forms and phases will live in the new. The old philosophies and the old religious rites were not without their strength in influencing the Church—how, in how far, and in what style, may be gathered from the ordinary church histories, and particularly from Tzschirner's "Fall des Heidenthums" ("Fall of Heathenism"). And the curious reader may see how a modern, who hates the church, has treated its grand triumph over the old religions of the world by consulting Froude's "Nemesis of Faith."

THE scene of the celebration of Dante's birthday, last summer, was redolent of his life. There was the very stone where, according to tradition, he stood and watched the building of the Duomo—the beautiful gates of the baptistry whose relievos he praised, the old civic palace where he acted as prior, the hospital endowed by the father of his life-long love, the street where he first saw her, the familiar architecture whence he drew his imagery. Here he studied art with Cimabue and Giotto; hence he went forth an honored ambassador to popes and princes; and hither turned his eager eyes during nineteen years of exile. The thrall of ideal love, the lessons of philosophy, the haven of domestic life, the strife of the partizan and the studies of the poet, are all associated with Florence. Here he espoused Gemma de' Donati; here seven children were born to him; here his wife rescued the early cantos of his immortal poem when his dwelling became a prey to the flames; and here it attained that fame whereby he was incited to its elaborate and gradual completion. The memorable characters, the most personal local apostrophe, the political tone, and many of the striking metaphors thereof, are identified with the Tuscan capital; above all, the mediæval atmosphere, ideas, and picturesqueness of the whole composition were derived from the sights, the social traits, and the intimate history of his native place. On the wall of the old Bargello the most authentic portrait of him was discovered; in the academies the earliest lectureship to illustrate his great work was founded; near by is the battle-field of Campaldino, where he fought. Elsewhere we are pointed to the rock where he rested, to the tower he immortalized, to the convent where he sojourned; but here he was disciplined in classical and church lore; here his muse first tried her wings; and to this beloved but repudiated home he scorned to return on conditions which militated against his pride of citizenship and his lofty self-respect. "Cannot I everywhere behold the sun," he wrote, "and stars, and speculate on sweetest truths, under any sky, without giving myself ingloriously, nay ignominiously, to the populace and city of Florence?"

Born in 1265, exiled in 1302, and dying in 1321, the last interval was spent in wandering from court to court—now the guest of Faggiuola at Sienna, now of the Scaligeri at Verona; two years at Pisa and Lucca, and, at last, with Guido da Polenta at Ravenna. Pleading with emperors and people, his bread salt with the tears of exiles, his feet weary with mounting alien stairs, persecuted by the church, ridiculed by courtiers, honored by patriots, neglected by his country, idolized by posterity, Dante's life was a solitary warfare, a patient aspiration. Studious of all lore, accomplished in all arts, deeply cognizant of nature, profoundly reverent of God, self-reliant, heroic, tender, stoical, intense, ideal—a philosopher, a statesman, a patriot, a martyr—his age, his faith, his country, were photographed by his genius. And yet, with all these claims to admiration, when we consider how science has emerged from the wearisome subtleties of the Middle Ages—how adverse is the direct and human interest of modern poetry to the abstract and allegorical—how the material faith of the early church has become spiritualized—how the dogmas of the past are lost in the discoveries of the present, and the metaphysical theories once prevalent have been superseded by the mechanical triumphs and the positive philosophy of the nineteenth century—it is a marvellous fact that a poet, who wrote six hundred years ago, should retain his hold, not upon the scholar and the antiquarian only, but upon the popular heart and mind of to-day. This is the memorable fact; this the crowning grace of the wonderful festival of last May in Florence. It is true, indeed, that criticism has indicated in the "Divina Commedia" the precursors of many of the pregnant truths which nourish the modern mind: we are told how Dante anticipated Bacon in the inductive philosophy, Columbus in his theory of a western continent, Newton in his discovery of the law of gravitation, Goethe in that of the metamorphosis of plants, and Luther as a reformer. The process of generation, the phenomena of rain, the chemical secrets of vinous fermentation, facts in astronomy, meteorology, and other spheres of natural science, attributed exclusively to a later era, are found hinted at or fully expounded by the Tuscan bard. But these are not the traits which beguile the multitude; neither are they won by the array of historic names, philosophy symbolized in Beatrice, arguments on free-will and foreknowledge, Platonism, ecclesiasticism, Greek mythology, Roman literature, the remote legends, the mystic speculations, and emblematic machinery of the poem. It is the deep and pure touches of nature that make the "whole world akin;" it is the naïve and vivid comparisons drawn from universal experience; it is such infinitely suggestive episodes as those of Francesca Pia and Ugolino; it is the reference to the vesper-bell, whose echoes draw tears from the wanderer; above all, it is the intense emphasis of a style born in a heart full of concentrated emotion, such as moulds expression into adamantine force and beauty, that enables Dante to grasp, with sympathetic intelligence, the mind of all time, and make his plea, his protest, and his patriotism vitally significant for ever. Even proverbial philosophy has adopted his allegorical and poetic idea of retribution—that "the rivers of hell are formed by the tears of humanity"—that on earth, as well as in the "Inferno," "the wretched souls of those who live without or praise or blame" are unworthy consideration—"speak not of them, but look and pass them by"—that "the greatest of sorrows is to recall happiness in days of misery"—and that they who enter into any diabolical career, as well as the gates of hell, "leave all hope behind."

The motive and scope of Professor Botta's work is characteristic of the influence of our institutions and social atmosphere upon foreign scholars. They soon become purveyors of knowledge when familiarized with the needs and customs of this country. At home they may have studied and taught with quite as much earnestness, but their sphere has been more limited and their impulse more personal. Such men as Lyell, Guyot, Agassiz, and Solger are irresistibly led to popularize science in America, and bring the fruits of researches, confined to the few at home, to the knowledge of the many here; less profound and exclusive, they become more adaptive and general. The object of the work before us is to convey such a knowledge of Dante's great poem and his relation to his country and literary history as will enable those who have neither the time nor taste to devote themselves to study, to understand the character and realize the special merits of the poet and his work. Such a book was a desideratum, and it appears to us that the author has well accomplished his object. He begins with describing the age of Dante, then gives a memoir of his life, and discusses his genius as a naturalist, a statesman, a lover, and a bard. This essay includes, of course, an account of his education, his relation to the Papacy, his exile, and his philosophy of life and humanity; finally, we have an analysis of the "Divina Commedia," with copious illustrative extracts from Cary's translation, interspersed with judicious selections from the best German, French, English, and Italian critics. However students of the original may differ or agree as to his interpretation of the more recondite parts of the poem, every candid reader must admit that in this handsome volume the author has brought together a large amount of desirable historical information, much curious speculation, and a luminous exposition of the whole subject; and that this is done with sympathy, tact, method, and a remarkable command of our vernacular.

By a singular coincidence the mortal remains of Dante came to light just as the altered political condition of his country had renewed his fame. To guard the sacred relics from a cardinal who proposed to decorate the chapel where the Franciscans of Ravenna had buried them at a time when their possession was eagerly coveted by all the Italian cities, but especially by his native Florence, the friars transferred them with the most careful registration to a cavity in the wall. Their discovery was thus announced by a journal of the day:

"Whilst some workmen were employed in clearing the chapel which contains Dante's monument from the outbuildings surrounding it, a peculiar noise in striking the outer wall suggested to them that some hollow might be found within. Accordingly, on using some violence on that portion of the wall where the hollow sound was produced, a wooden coffin was discovered, from which several bones fell out in the confusion of the first discovery. On a scroll within the coffin was found written, 'Dantis ossa a me Frate Antonio Santi hic posita 1677, die 18 Octobris,' and inside the lid of the coffin the following inscription was placed: 'Dantis ossa denuper revisa 3 Junii, 1677.' The coffin had been stowed away with its precious deposit within this mural sepulchre at that date, and had remained there till now. The Italian deputy Monzani, Colonel Malenchini, and Otto Vannucci were in 'Dante's chapel' at the moment of the interesting discovery.

"The prefect and mayor of Ravenna were forthwith called to the spot. The skeleton head and bones of Dante were examined carefully in their presence. Save a fragment of the cranium, the whole of the lower jaw, and three joints of the right hand, which were missing, all the bones were found to be intact. The head was moderately large, broad at the temples, whilst the base of the skull bears token of an equally large development. The archives of the Franciscan convent of Ravenna were forthwith searched by the party, and amongst the atti of the Franciscan brethren, at the date indicated by the inscription on the lid of Dante's coffin, were found the various acts relating to the subject; all were signed by the same Frate Santi, whose name is on the scroll, and who styles himself moreover 'Cancelliere' of the convent."

This preservation of Dante's remains, and their timely discovery, is the more remarkable from the fact that when Cardinal Pogetto ordered the poet's treatise, "De Monarchia," to be burned, he intended the same fate for his bones. Escaping this sacrilegious destruction, they were long exposed to surreptitious removal. Byron's reproach, was not due to negligence; for, when the beautiful monument in Santa Croce was finished, and long as well as often before, his remorseful countrymen begged for his ashes; but Leo X. refused to have them disturbed, and, within a year or two, Ravenna has reiterated her proud refusal to yield the relics of the poet, whose last asylum was her ancient court and whose tomb is her most precious trophy.

> "Ungrateful Florence, Dante sleeps afar, > Like Scipio buried by the upbraiding shore,"

For months prior to the natal celebrations, local journals were issued all over Italy, wherein anecdotes, criticisms, and historical details in regard to Dante and his great poem were published to enlighten the masses and educate the public mind to enter intelligently into the spirit of the occasion. This is a striking and benign illustration of the intellectual revival of the land; and the unanimity and zeal of the people in rallying to a festival, at once literary and national, quenched the mean intrigues of demagogues who sought to turn the disappointment of rival cities at the removal of the capital to Florence into mischievous political discontent; as the birth-place of their illustrious poet, that city became "a Mecca of the mind" to all patriotic Italians. As the river their poet loved, the Arno was a welcome goal. But the knowledge so requisite to the appreciation of the "Divina Commedia" is inevitably confined to the few and cultivated. In popular estimation it is the exquisite or solemn touches of poetry and not the mediæval theology, the patriotism and not the politics, the humanity and not the philosophy, of the bard that seizes the imagination and thrills the heart. That stern distribution of rewards and punishments—the leaden cloaks of the hypocrites—the wallowing agony of the sensualists—the downward gaze of the avaricious, more horribly vivid from the tender gleams of compassion and the familiar and endeared images drawn from common nature and ordinary life—impress and haunt the minds of a people equally, by nature, sensitive and fanciful. They may not wholly follow the poet in his historical allusions to Virgil, Justinian, Charlemagne, and Cato; they cannot reach the "height of his great argument," when the highest problems of religion and philosophy are discussed in Paradise; his angels and demons, his symbolic eagle, and inspired Beatrice, may be vague and baffling revelations; for it has been truly said that "the Italians call him divine, but his is a hidden divinity;"—not so, however, those traits and triumphs of expression, so frequent and memorable, which deal with the affections and experiences of our common nature; wherein, as in Shakespeare, the vision is so true, the feeling so profound and real, the utterance so keen and comprehensive, that her poet reaches the universal soul of humanity.

Longfellow, in a graceful sonnet, has aptly compared the employment of Dante's translator to entering a cathedral. He confines the parallel to the solemn influences thus encountered, contrasted with the immediate absorption of the senses in the sounds and sights of common life—the sublimity of the temple with the vulgar cares of the street; but it is susceptible of yet more detailed comparison, for the infinite variety of impressions derivable from the "Divina Commedia," from those of simple awe and beauty to those of knowledge and reflection, find their counterparts in the complex influences embodied in these venerable temples of religion. To the thoughtful scholar there is deep meaning in every phase and form of the architecture, in the quaint mediæval carvings, in the worn Latin inscriptions of the pavement. History whispers to him from the sepulchral effigies of prelate, civic ruler, and knight, in the Christianized relics of paganism, in the radiant figures of apostles, and the escutcheon of a renowned family; while in the wail of the newly-born infant offered for baptism, and the catafalque of the aged dead, or the tomb of the maiden, there is a world of suggestive teaching in the mysteries of life and mortality. The faded banners are associated with old wars, and the majestic pillars are trophies of Grecian civilization. The kneeling peasant is too ignorant to take in these abstract hints of time and truth; but his senses are rapt in reverent devotion as he reads the saintly legend emblazoned on the stained glass of the vast window, inhales the odor of incense, beholds the jewel-studded crucifix or listens to the deeply-musical vibrations of choir and organ; and so is it, with the grand poem as interpreted by the imaginative and uninformed and the thinker and scholar.

Yet it is the influence of Dante upon select intelligences, and upon the historical development of literature, which, perhaps, brings home to us most clearly a true sense of his permanence and power. The "Divina Commedia" is the connecting link between ancient and modern thought, the harbinger of that great change which substituted a living for a dead language, and, by the force and beauty imparted thereto, revealed its unappreciated richness of expression. Thus embalmed—the lore and legends, the dogmas and conflicts, the grandeur and gloom, of the Middle Ages were conserved in vital unity for succeeding time. Add to this the fact that Dante was "the sincerest of all poets," and his influence on such minds in literature as Petrarch, Macchiavelli, Alfieri, Milton, Byron, Foscolo, Leopardi, and Pellico, and in art as Giotto, Orcagna, Michael Angelo, Doré, Schaeffer, Fuseli, and Blomberg, seems as natural as that he inspired the pious soul of Lammenais and the patriotic heart of Rienzi. The obsolete feuds of Neri and Bianchi have no interest for the practical mind of the nineteenth century; Enid Cavalcanti's friendship and Can Grande's patronage are too remote in their personal associations to win the earnest sympathy of many modern readers; but the remorseful effigies of men who ruled the world centuries ago, moulded from the lava-like overflow of an intrepid, indignant, but tender soul—the fond and patient recognition of truth, whether natural or spiritual—the artistic picturesqueness, wherewith the panorama of the past in church and state is delineated—the mortal anguish and the celestial aspiration which form at once the crown and cross of life—these are elements which greet us over the abyss of time in the immortal epic of the Tuscan.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Annual Report of the Smithsonian Institution, lately published (for 1863), contains articles on several subjects, interesting to intelligent readers generally. It has long been thought desirable, that some of the many facts collected by that institution should be more widely circulated than their occasional volumes can ever be; and short notices of such as are best adapted to be understood and appreciated by the mass of the people may in some degree supply the defect of a small and cheap periodical publication, in simple language, until one shall be issued from the proper source. We may, perhaps, hereafter notice some of the papers most likely to interest our readers.

The Repeal of Mortmain in Colombia. Informe del Ajente General de Bienes Desamortizados. 1865. Bogota.—This is a folio pamphlet of above fifty pages, many of them filled with tables in small types, giving the details of the numerous mortmain estates in New Granada (now called the United States of Colombia), that Spanish-American republic which occupies the northwestern corner of South America, including the Isthmus of Panama, and the territory above it to the southern boundary of Central America. It is strange to see here a renewal of such a period as that in English history which we are accustomed to regard as belonging to a long-past age, when the Romish Church was deprived of its immense estates by a sweeping act of confiscation; and the exposure made of the immense wealth which still remained to the clergy of our neighbor republic, even after the important curtailments to which they had previously been subjected. The obstacles placed in the way of carrying into effect the laws passed for that end, indicate something of the magnitude of the task which the Liberal party have had to perform, and increase our estimate of their energy and perseverance in the cause of civil and religious liberty. Among the difficulties of which the general agent complains, is the unwillingness in many persons to afford necessary information, by which the settlement of estates is delayed.

Instructions Relative to the Ethnology and Philology of America. Appendix A. By George Gibbs, Esq.—This is a small pamphlet noting the peculiarities observed in the physical conformations, constitutions, complexions, languages, food, etc., of various nations and tribes of Indians, with indications of interesting objects of enquiry and record, together with tables for numerals. Particular attention is invited to the principles on which numeral systems are founded; and interesting facts are given relating to the use of several series of numerals, used by certain savage tribes, varying according to the nature of objects enumerated. In some languages counting is done by fives, instead of by tens; and in others both by fives and tens. These and other curious peculiarities need explanation, and the facts should be ascertained and published.

Speech of the Honorable Charles Sumner at the Republican State Convention at Worcester, Sept. 14, 1865.—Mr. Sumner's speech has been already in great part reported in the daily papers, but in their columns it received only half the attention it deserved. We are glad to see it issued in a pamphlet form. It is the fullest declaration of the Radical faith which has appeared, supplying, too, an excellent commentary on that admirable piece of political writing—in our judgment the most skilful and finished piece of literary work produced by the war—the Massachusetts "Letter to the President." Mr. Sumner's fertility in illustration, always the fruit of wide and various reading, has seldom been better displayed than in the pamphlet before us; and the appeal to the President and Cabinet with which it closes is unusually forcible and impressive.

Fine Arts.

ART NOTES.

A large exhibition of the fine arts, as applied to industry, opened at the new building in the Champs Elysées, in Paris, on the 12th of August. It comprises several departments: first, a collection of manufactured objects of all kinds which can be included under the name of fine arts—bronzes, porcelain, jewelry, engravings, statuary, furniture, etc.; second, a collection of drawings and models made by the students in the various schools of Paris and the departments, intended as a specimen of the kind of teaching given and of the progress made; third, a loan collection of mediæval art, somewhat similar to the loan collections exhibited every year at the South Kensington Museum. Here are most exquisite specimens of Faenza ware, of Palissy pottery, of Limoges and other enamels, of ivory and wood carvings, of Venetian and other glass, of arms, accoutrements, embroidery, jewelry, book-binding, etc. This collection abounds in splendid things. One of the most beautiful objects is a Byzantine enamel figure of St. George and the Dragon, of the eleventh or twelfth century. Another remarkable thing is a carved wood tryptych of German workmanship: in the centre, within an aureole, is the Virgin, holding the child and standing on a crescent moon; in each wing are figures of saints in low relief; at the foot the Saviour, crowned with thorns, St. John, and the Virgin. The collection of carved ivories is of great value in helping to form an historical idea of French art. There are some remarkably fine examples of Henri II. ware, of which only fifty-two pieces are known to exist—twenty-six of these being in England. The real history and origin of this ware has but lately been discovered. The Government did not exhibit in this collection, and all the pieces were loaned by private owners; among them, however, the Empress. Other contributors were MM. Rothschild, Chevalier, Basilewsky, Charpentier, Jermaul, and Gatteaux. Mr. James Jackson Jarves contributed several very fine specimens from his growing and already very valuable collection of Majolica and Palissy ware; no less than sixteen pieces of Majolica alone appear in the catalogue as loaned by him. Mr. Jarves, while adding to his precious collection of pictures, is also getting together such works of decorative art as these for America, and all Americans owe him sincere thanks.

—The magnificent kind of pottery known as Henri II. ware has for years been one of the puzzles of archæologists. Nothing has been known of its maker or makers, of the place or of the exact date of its manufacture. Fifty-two pieces are known to exist, twenty-six in England, twenty-five in France, and one in Russia. Of these, no two are alike, and most of them differ very widely each from the other in decoration, even where their forms somewhat approximate. Almost every piece is of elaborate design and richly ornamental; almost every piece bears the monogram or the arms of some royal or noble house. Of the twenty-six pieces in England five belong to the national collection at South Kensington, and these five have cost the nation one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight pounds sterling (£1,788); the most expensive of these is a candlestick, which cost £750. There is a "biberon" in the possession of a private gentleman in London which cost even more than the English Government paid for their candlestick; eleven hundred pounds were paid for it at the sale of the famous Pourtales collection in Paris. This most precious of ceramic ware at last has a history. M. Benjamin Fillon, of Poictiers, an antiquary of renown—the same gentleman who found that manuscript of Bernard Palissy's at Rochelle which threw light on the recent discovery in the Tuileries grounds, mentioned in THE NATION, No. 9—has brought to light family documents which account for and explain all the peculiarities of make, design, armorial bearings, and initials and monograms which have been remarked and studied in this curious ware. It was made at Oiron, in the department of Deux Sèvres, in the former half of the sixteenth century, and at the orders or at least under the patronage of the wealthy and noble family Gouffier. The arms of William Gouffier are on one piece of this pottery, and his initials on another.

—A new building, to contain the National Gallery at London, so long needed, is likely to be built. The subject was introduced into the last Parliament, and an appropriation is hoped for from the present one. Members of Parliament want to build cheaply, and think that £100,000 will be enough for the purpose. The present inadequate building cost £96,000, and it would seem that a worthy receptacle ought to be found, even at a much greater cost, for the Veronese that cost £14,000 and the Raffaelle that cost £9,000. Mr. Philip Gilbert Hamerton sets forth, in No. 7 of the "Fortnightly Review," his idea of what a great gallery should be. He would have one large, low building of one story high, divided by partition walls into long corridors, and perfectly fire-proof. In these corridors every picture should be hung on what is called the line—that is, with the horizon line about five feet from the floor. Each picture should be surrounded by a broad margin of wall, equivalent to about half the breadth of the picture. The walls should be covered with flock paper of a rich dark maroon color, with a scarcely perceptible pattern of the same tint. Special pictures should be specially considered as to their surroundings, and the fittings of the whole gallery, floors, and ceilings, should be exquisite and perfect and varied. For greater effect there should be a stately building in connection with the great one-story shed, and fronting on Trafalgar Square, containing rooms for the display of collections of ceramic ware, or fevrine, etc. Through this building should be the grand entrance to the gallery.

—The Philadelphia Sketch Club have undertaken an enterprise of some importance, to which we are glad to call attention. A circular, signed by the president of the club, and dated June 8, sets forth that a prize of two thousand dollars is offered for the "finest work of art illustrative of the great American Rebellion," under these conditions: First—All contributors must be residents of the United States. Second—Contributions must be sent in by December 1, 1866. Third—"Statuary must be presented in a finished condition, whether bronze or marble" (what that means we can only guess). Fourth—All persons intending to compete must notify the president by October 1. (Presumably October 1, 1866.) And three conditions more. Another circular of same date offers the following prizes: Two hundred dollars for the finest painting in oil, and one hundred dollars for the second best; one hundred dollars for the finest work of sculpture, and fifty dollars for the second best; seventy-five dollars for the finest water-color drawing, and fifty for the second best; the same amounts for the finest and for the second best drawing in crayon, lead-pencil, pen-and-ink, sepia, or India ink, and also for "the finest specimen of illumination or fancy designing of any description." These prizes are offered under several conditions, among others these: The works of art must be sent in by December 1, 1865; the oil paintings and works of sculpture remain the property of the artists, but the other works of art which take prizes become the property of the club; no works of art will be received which have previously been exhibited. Under date of September 8 comes another circular, urging those who have received the former circulars to answer at once, and signify their intention of competing or not. The works of art offered will be exhibited in Philadelphia, the exhibition to begin on the 5th of December next, and to remain open a month. If the exhibition is a creditable one it will be held in New York as well, and will open on the 9th of January, 1866, and remain open a month. The circulars are signed by the president of the Philadelphia Sketch Club, Mr. Charles F Hazeltine, whose address is No. 240 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

—An architectural composition of a somewhat novel nature has been completed in Paris, under the direction of M. Eugène Lacroix. It is the interior of the chapel of the Palais de l'Elysée. Some originality of treatment was needed, for the conditions were peculiar. The space allowed for the chapel was less than fifty feet long, and low and narrow in proportion to its length, and was lighted from one side only. Great richness of material and abundant decoration have been employed to make the chapel, in spite of the narrow limits to which it was confined, worthy of its connection with an imperial residence. The general character of the architecture is what is called, in France and in Germany, Byzantine, a round-arched style of mediæval character, requiring rich decorations in mosaic and painting to show its strength. Such have been freely given, and a very splendid marble pavement is added. But the chief interest is in the pictures which are painted on the walls. They have been executed, under the direction of the architect, by M. Sébastien Cornu. In twelve arched compartments on three sides of the chapel are painted figure-subjects illustrating the establishment of Christianity in France. Instead, therefore, of the more usual series of the twelve apostles with their attributes, twelve persons eminent in the ecclesiastical history and legend of France are represented. A splendid opportunity was thus afforded for the ambition of a painter at once learned, imaginative, and religious, for among the twelve heroes and heroines of the Church in France are Charlemagne and St. Louis, St. Genevieve of Paris and St. Clotilde, mythical St. Denis and scarcely less mythical St. Martin of Tours, St. Rêmi and St. Cloud. The series of paintings, in connection with the building of which they form an essential part, may be reckoned in every respect among the two or three most important works of art of modern times in France.

—Professor John A. Nichols, who is head of the department of applied mathematics in the New York Free Academy, delivered a short address before the University Convocation at Albany, in July, 1864. His remarks have recently been printed in a small pamphlet. His subject was "Drawing as a Branch of College Education." He treated principally of mathematical drawing, as was natural, but had a good word to say for artistic drawing as well. The study of drawing in both these branches has always formed an important part of the educational course of the Free Academy. The collection of casts from antique statuary, though small, is very valuable; the casts were made in Europe, most of them at first hand, under the direction of a man whom many New Yorkers remember with love, Paul Peter Duggan, who was the first professor of drawing and the arts of design at the Academy, and who still held that post when he died at Paris in 1861.

Science.

—THE thirteenth anniversary of the Royal Geographical Society was held on the 22d of May. The President, Sir Roderick L. Murchison, in his address, remarked that he had occupied the chair at eleven annual meetings in the thirty-five years of the society's existence. Eight months ago, the celebrated explorer of inner Africa, John Hanning Speke, lost his life on the day that he had attended the meeting of the geographical branch of the British Association. Dr. Grant and Dr. Livingstone attended his funeral with Sir Roderick. He was born in 1827, of an eminent Saxon family. The death of the Duke of Northumberland was noticed, with an account of his services to science; also Dr. Hugh Falconer, the Duke of Newcastle, the Hon. Edward Everett, Dr. Baikie, Mr. Hudson Gurney, Rear-Admiral H. A. Murray, Mr. Joshua Bates, Samuel Cartwright, Benjamin Silliman, Thomas Young, John G. Phillimore, Henry Christy, George Dodd, Vice-Admiral Robert Fitz Roy. The names of many other deceased members are added. The Admiralty hydrographical examination of the shores of the United Kingdom is nearly completed. A more comprehensive system is to be adopted to meet the changes taking place from the operations of nature. Two small steamers, the boats of the Channel Islands survey, and a small establishment near Plymouth, will constitute the home surveying force. The foreign surveys are now to be conducted by having one of the small ships of war on each station as an auxiliary surveying vessel; and China will first be placed under this system. A third vessel has been sent thither. The estuary of the Thames in Suffolk has been examined, and the shoals and channels between Lowescroft and Yarmouth are to be examined, and the Downs are under a new survey. Deep-sea soundings off Cornwall and Devon, and the south shore of the British Channel, and the surveys of Portsmouth harbor and Scotch islands of Coll and Tyree and Loch Sunart have been made; and the off-shore soundings, sixty miles out between Ireland and the Hebrides, embracing 3,600 square miles, where several large and valuable fishing-banks were discovered. The Mediterranean survey has been carried on on the coast west of Greece, and examinations made in the Gulf of Patras, some of the Ionian Islands, etc., with plans of several harbors. The Malta channel and the coast of Tunis have been surveyed. Captain Orlebar has been employed thirty years on the survey of the St. Lawrence, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland, and has resigned, and been succeeded by Mr. J. H. Kero. Captain Shortland is expected to complete the survey of Nova Scotia this year, an area of 4,000 miles. But the dangerous banks are yet to be more closely examined. Tobago is under survey, and the coral reefs of the Bermudas, to remove obstructions for large ships. British Columbia, Vancouver's Island, Australia, South Africa, Japan, and the Chinese Sea, are all receiving attention.

Particular mention was made in the address of geographical explorations in Australia. Without dwelling on the discovery of that continent by the Portuguese, the examination of its coasts by the famous Dutch navigator Tasman, the voyages of Cook, or the founding of the only great colony, New South Wales, which, in 1830, had about 50,000 inhabitants sctatered over 34,500 square miles, the president remarked that the interior was believed to be an inland sea, although Flinders had given pretty accurate knowledge of the eastern and southern coasts and parts of the northern. Capt. Sturt, however, reached and sailed down the Murray River, more than 2,000 miles, to Encounter Bay, on the south coast; and South Australia was found in 1834. Eyre, in 1837, discovered the vast plains north of the present colony of Victoria, and afterwards travelled along the southern coast between South and West Australia, suffering almost unexampled privations, the country being a saline desert without rivers. He is now Governor of Jamaica. In 1837, Lieutenants Grey and Lushington entered from the north-west, and discovered several rivers, the Glenelg and Murchison. Victoria had been occupied by a few squatters in 1803, but did not begin to flourish until the discovery of the gold mines. Count Strzelecki prosecuted surveys at his own cost five years of nearly the entire hilly region of Eastern Australia, from Mount Kosciusko, 6,510 feet above the sea, to the northern tracts now forming part of the new colony of Queensland. Having promised Governor Sir G. Gipps not to reveal the existence of gold, he did not make it known. In 1844, Dr. Leichhardt left Moreton Bay (now Queensland) on an exploring journey, and after thirteen months reached Port Essington, and reported many districts favorable to sheep pasturage, to which they are now devoted. The year previous Sturt had planned a general survey of Victoria from north to south, and from east to west, and, with Macdonald Stuart, he crossed the lower parts of Murray and Darling Rivers on his way northward, and reached a sterile desert of clay in east longitude 138°, suffering for a time from heat at 132° Fahrenheit in the shade, falling afterwards to 24°. It was long before the erroneous opinion was dispelled that the northern interior was entirely an unprofitable desert; but it is now estimated that, whatever amount of such territory may exist in the heart of the continent, north of 27° south latitude is different, and tropical Australia is, on the whole, rich and fertile. The fate of Leichhardt in his second journey, commenced in 1848, is unknown, though Mr. McIntyre, recently from the interior, thinks his route may yet be discovered, and the ladies of Melbourne have commenced a subscription for that purpose. In 1853, an expedition well fitted out left New South Wales, under Mr. Augustus Gregory, to explore North Australia, and landed east of Cambridge Gulf, at the mouth of North Victoria River. Finding an arid country south-southwest, he turned southeast, discovered vast rich lands (now fast settling), and reached Moreton Bay. He afterwards passed from the east to South Australia through much poor land. Macdonald Stuart, after three independent but unsuccessful expeditions, started north in 1860 from South Australia, and discovered in the centre of the continent a well watered, grassy region. At length, after two returns to Adelaide, he reached Van Dieman's Gulf. Sheep, it is now decided, will thrive in the heated intertropical regions. Arrowsmith's maps have kept pace with these discoveries. Two-thirds of Australia are now settled, and the population is near one and a half millions, and a brisk intercourse is soon to be expected with the East Indies, China, and Japan.

From the great success of this Company they are enabled to offer superior advantages to policy-holders.

Life policies are issued, payable in annual, or in one, five, or ten annual instalments; also non-forfeiture endowment policies, payable in ten annual payments, which are paid at death, or on arriving at any particular age. Life insurance, as an investment, has no superior, as it has saved millions of dollars to the insured, and thousands of families from ruin. Dividends are paid to policy-holders, thus enabling them to continue their policies, if otherwise unable to do so.

This favorable feature has been the means of saving many policies that would have been forfeited for want of means to continue them, and, in several instances, families once wealthy have thus been saved from utter ruin.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

SATURDAY A.M.

THE business of the week has been generally active. The dry goods trade, which showed signs of halting about a fortnight since, is again improving, especially in foreign goods. The demand for woollen fabrics and ready-made winter clothing is quite large, and prices dear. It is remarked that nearly all descriptions of clothing are higher with gold at 144, than this time last year with gold at 244 to 250. The same remark, indeed, applies to goods and household commodities generally. Thus, plain domestic cotton goods, like shirtings and sheetings, are selling higher with the raw material worth only 45 cents than when it commanded 150 or 160 cents the pound. The foreign dry goods import this week is in value $3,129,000, nearly the whole going directly into the market, only $226,000 of the amount into bonded warehouse. The gold customs received into the Treasury for the week will reach about two and a half millions. The prepayments at New York on the November gold interest amount to $1,325,000 since last Monday, when they began under the order of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The receipts of cotton at New York for the week amount to 23,107 bales. The large stocks here and at New Orleans, Mobile, Galveston, etc., show but little diminution. They must now aggregate at least 275,000 bales. The export movement of cotton is slow. Scarcely 20 per cent. of the New York receipts go forward to England, the price here being yet too high to let in free export orders. Some of the heaviest receivers and holders are borrowing money on their own paper, with pledge of warehouse receipts, rather than yield in price, thought it is not difficult to see that this expensive and questionable operation must soon come to an end, unless a further considerable advance should take place in Liverpool.

Although exports are thus kept back, and amount altogether to less than one-half in gold value of the current imports of the past few weeks, there is no inclination indulged to advance exchange to the full rates at which it would be profitable to ship gold coin. The rate for both mail days this week has not been over 109⅝ on actual free sales, a leading banking house drawing at this figure, partly against some parcels of gold bars received by the last packet from California. The transmissions of U. S. 5–20s this week have not been large, though this operation goes on steadily through certain Continental houses by every steamer. The supply of the old bonds on this market is about equal to the demand from abroad, while the 5–20s have become suddenly scarce, and have advanced to a point within 1⅜ to 1½ of the old. The usual stock-jobbing rumors of "new loans" by the Treasury are repeated from day to day on and around the Stock Exchange, but have become so "fishy" and absurd, in the face of the large balances in the New York Sub-Treasury, as to have no influence whatever on Government stocks, and only involve the railway speculators who give them credence in short sales which they are unable to cover without loss. Even the funding of compound interest legal tenders, so confidently under discussion—and which has some ground of probability—is delayed, although these notes are in demand, both in prospect of funding and in the belief that they are a good investment at present rates for the compound interest, 6 per cent. a year, which they carry until 1867, if not previously exchanged for gold-bearing bonds. The notes dated June, 1864, are worth 105½ to 106 (the actual accrued interest would make them 107½ to 108); the July and August, 104 to 105; October and December, 102¼ to 103½ per cent.

The gold-check forgeries in August unsettled confidence in the Bank of New York plan of conducting business for the bullion brokers, and although they had each paid their $1,000 to the bank for keeping their gold accounts for the year, the line of deposits in gold soon fell from $9,800,000 to about $2,500,000, at which it now stands. The occurrence induced a number of influential parties to bring to the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury the authority and public usefulness and great convenience of making the Treasury Office a depository for gold, under the act of March, 1863, and, after due consideration, we believe he has determined to issue gold certificates of denominations from $5,000 down to $50 or $20, under the following authority in the act referred to:

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to receive deposits of gold coin and bullion with the Treasurer or any Assistant Treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than twenty dollars, and to issue certificates therefor, in denominations of not less than twenty dollars each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin and bullion deposited for or representing the certificates of deposit shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand. And certificates representing coin in the Treasury may be issued in payment of interest on the public debt, which certificates, together with those issued for coin and bullion deposited, shall not at any time exceed twenty per centum beyond the amount of coin and bullion in the Treasury, and the certificates for coin or bullion in the Treasury shall be received at par in payment for duties on imports."

The third meeting of bank officers, last Tuesday, on the subject of discrimination in the national currency, resulted in no practical action. A new committee was ordered and the old committee discharged, and their plans adjourned over. About one half of the banks in the city were represented. The necessity, if any should ever arise, for agitating the subject, is so remote that the movement will probably be dropped, as it was once before in Boston and Philadelphia, as well as New York.

The rates for money are 5 to 6 per cent. a year to the stock-brokers, on call, and 6½ to 8 per cent. to the discount brokers on prime paper. The price of gold shows only slight variations from day to day, and speculation in it is very dull, thanks to the business-like management of the Secretary of the Treasury, in so disposing his heavy customs receipts as to avoid all pretext to advance the price, because of his large accumulations. We believe his Assistant Treasurer in New York continues his daily sales in the open market, besides prepaying the November interest.

UNITED STATES SECURITIES.

The old 5-20s have receded from 108⅛ to 108¼ to 107⅞ to 107⅞, the new advanced to 106⅝, but are now 106⅝ to 106¼. The 10-40s, same as last Saturday, 94¼, and 6s of 1881, 108 per cent. The 7.30 currency loans are quiet at 99⅛ to 99¼, and Treasury certificates of indebtedness are from 98⅞ to 99 per cent. We have already quoted the demand and prices for compound legal tenders.

STATE SECURITIES.

New York 7 per cent. bounty scrip is 98¼ to 98¾ and interest. As the transfers for the quarterly (October) interest are now closed, the scrip is sold flat. There is a further rise to 77½ in Missouri bonds, and to 80 to 82 in North Carolina. Virginias have taken a start from 60 up to 65 per cent. Tennessees, as last week, 82 to 83 per cent. The Louisiana bonds are liberally bid for, but they are not in the market.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

There is nothing new to report in railway mortgages, but we revise the bidding rates at the Stock Exchange:

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, is pursuing a journey through the South. His letters appear every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the fol lowing names:

CRUSHERS AND PULVERIZERS,

FOR WET OR DRY WORKING,

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

105 STATE STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

Miners should not purchase machinery before seeing, or sending their friends to examine, the practical working of this series of machinery.

☞ The Whirling Table, or Crusher, weighs less than two tons, and crushes from ten to twelve tons of ore per hour to fine gravel, or two hundred and fifty tons in twenty-four hours.

The Pulverizer weighs two tons, and pulverizes to dust, infinitely finer than stamp work, one ton of ore per hour, or twenty-four tons per diem, equal to the yield of twenty-five or thirty stamps; and the first cost and wear, as compared to this number of stamps, is about one-tenth;—the entire yield being fit for amalgamation without further reduction. The fine dust is not obtained by screening, but by the immediate action of the Pulverizer.

Fifteen horse-power, net, is the maximum power required for one machine.

The cost of the wear, per ton, is less than by any other machine. All wearing parts are now made of Franklinite iron.

Let miners and their friends carefully study the practical working of all other machines and processes offered, and then see ours working in East Boston, Mass. We ask only this.

All of our machines are now made in our own shop. No CONTRACT WORK.

The Week.

THE public debt, on the 31st of August, stood at $2,757,689,571; on the 30th of September, at $2,744,947,726; showing a comforting decrease of more than twelve and a half millions in a single month. We have reached apparently the financial limit between peace and war, and if the rate of retrogression from the latter is contained in the first backward step, we shall have extinguished a hundred and fifty millions in a twelvemonth. The reduction of interest in these thirty days was more than $500,000.

THE Democratic party in this State evidently made a great mistake when, looking about for a general for the governorship, they made their platform so easy to swallow. For they might have had General Slocum on much easier terms than they have offered. He is not only, he says, opposed to negro suffrage, but he is opposed to all interference on the part of the Government between the freedmen and their late masters. He wants the Freedmen's Bureau abolished, General Howard and his agents recalled, the troops now at the South withdrawn, and the whites left to deal with the blacks as they please, provided always that they abolish slavery. This is more than the platform called for. He adds that it is entirely untrue that he was "annoyed" when the President overruled his order breaking up the standing militia. He was delighted with it. He thought the calling of it out a good thing, but was under the impression that the Government would not allow it. It is true that, in his order prohibiting it, he declared that most of the outrages which occurred in the State "were committed on Northern men, Government couriers, and colored people, and not on Southerners, and that the militia were filled with prejudice against the colored troops, against the execution of the orders relative to the freedmen, and even against our Government itself." It is also true that "he now heartily approves of the removal of the troops from Mississippi, and most earnestly hopes that within thirty days every soldier now on duty there will be mustered out of the service, and that all attempts to interfere in her local affairs will cease." Some evil-minded persons will doubtless find some difficulty in reconciling all these statements. But the explanation of the contradictions which they contain is perfectly simple. When General Slocum was in Mississippi, he was General Slocum; now he is the Democratic candidate for the governorship of New York, and goes about in company with that well-known patriot, Horatio Seymour. Some unscrupulous wag at the recent meeting at Syracuse presented Mr. Seymour with a bouquet made up to represent the national colors—red, white, and blue.

THE Congress of Berne has found an echo in Boston, where, on Wednesday of last week, a society for the promotion of social science was formed at the State House, with Gov. Andrew in the chair. Not only is this movement a sign of the return of peace, but the names of many of those who were prominent in it remind us that they were unjustly charged before the war with being men of one idea, who could neither think nor talk of anything but slavery. We believe that they were sincere when they replied that they wished for nothing more devoutly than an end of "agitation." Happily the association was made national and not local. Its object is "to guide the public mind to the best practical means of promoting the amendments to the laws, the advancement of education, the prevention and repression of crime, the reformation of criminals, the adoption of sanitary regulations, and the diffusion of sound principles on questions of economy, trade, and finance, with special attention to pauperism and the topics relating thereto." The division of topics is contained in the following list of officers:

President: Professor Wm. B. Rogers.

Vice-Presidents: For Department of Education, Rev. Dr. Thomas Hill; Sanitary Reform, Dr. Samuel G. Howe; Social Economy, Rev. Theodore D. Woolsey of New Haven; Jurisprudence, Professor Francis Lieber of New York.

Directors: Education, Rev. Erastus O. Haven of Michigan; Sanitary Reform, Mrs. Samuel Parkman, Jr., of Boston; Social Economy, Edward Atkinson of Boston; Jurisprudence, Hon. Emory Washburn of Cambridge; Library, Mrs. Caroline H. Dall.

Treasurer: Charles H. Dalton.

Corresponding Secretary: Samuel Eliot.

Recording Secretary: Frank P. Sanborn of Concord.

Special Secretaries: For Department of Education, Hon. Joseph White of Massachusetts; Sanitary Reform, Dr. James C. White of Boston; Social Economy, George Walker; Jurisprudence, Prof. Theodore W. Dwight of New York.

The annual fee of membership was fixed at three dollars, after signing the constitution; life-membership, at fifty. At the afternoon session Mr. W. P. Atkinson presented his views on education, and the Hon. Amasa Walker discussed the national finances. The date of the next meeting was left to the discretion of the executive committee.

THE Count Joannes has offered his professional services to General Robert E. Lee, to defend him in case he is tried for treason, and the general has written "gratefully accepting them." This incident will lead the public to desire more than ever to have the great rebel brought to justice, in order to enjoy the Count's forensic exertions in his behalf. The most illustrious of modern traitors, defended by the most notorious of "common barrators," would form a spectacle unequalled since the trial of Warren Hastings. If Jefferson Davis doesn't retain the Count also, before the Government buys him up, he must be tired of life.

GENERAL BANKS has returned to Massachusetts, and by special invitation he addressed the citizens of the great manufacturing town of Lawrence on the important question of reconstruction, last week. He spoke at length, and took ground in support of "radical" doctrines. Respecting negro suffrage, he said: "The question was, whether it was possible to prevent the negro from voting. And he had no hesitation in saying that it was not in the power of man to prevent the extension of the franchise to the black laborers of the South. We must accept this result as one of the inevitable events of the future, and prepare the emancipated for the exercise of the powers which they are eventually to have. This preparation could be made only by those who had fought for the Union and sustained the Government, and to them the negro would look for it." He said, too, that if political power at the South were given to the rebels, the result would be the destruction of free institutions and principles. If given to the masses of the people, with such support as Government could extend to them, the result would be the security and perpetuation of free institutions and the maintenance of the rights of all classes of our citizens. In speaking of military matters, he alluded to the taking of Port Hudson, and declared that but for the colored troops the Union army would not have been successful at that place. General Banks, it is supposed, will be a candidate for the office of representative from the Sixth Congressional District of Massachusetts, a vacancy having been made there in consequence of the appointment of Mr. Gooch, who was chosen last year to the place of Naval Officer of the port of Boston.

Union College, which is situated at Schenectady, has heeded the very profitable discussion concerning classical and scientific education to which Mr. Atkinson's pamphlet gave so vigorous an impulse. It has recently established two baccalaureate courses for the election of students, equal in length and designed to be fully so in amount of study and value of discipline. The classical course replaces the ancient with the modern languages, with an enlargement of mathematical and English studies. We believe that the college will be sustained in its liberal experiment, and that it only needs to produce good fruit to effect the desired revolution in all similar institutions. It is a curious fact that the late Dr. Wayland, who died at Providence on the last day of September, and who, a graduate of Union College in 1813, returned to it as a professor in 1826, and was for twenty-eight years president of Brown University, advocated this elective system as early as 1842, in a work entitled "Thoughts on the Collegiate System of the United States."

One of the final acts of the Alabama Convention was to approve, provisionally, the arrangement which Gen. Swayne and Gov. Parsons had made in regard to negro testimony in civil courts, of which the justices serve as agents of the Freedmen's Bureau. Gov. Sharkey has proclaimed his acceptance of Col. Thomas's proposition, by which the civil authorities relieve the Bureau of cases involving the rights of freedmen, on condition that the mode of procedure shall be according to the laws now in force, except where they make distinctions of color. The blacks are to be protected in person and property, can be sued and have the right to sue, and may be competent witnesses conformably to the rules of evidence. Gov. Marvin, in a recent speech at Quincy, Florida, boldly asserts that the new constitution "must declare that persons of color shall be admitted as witnesses in all the courts of civil jurisprudence. The law, in this respect, must have no distinction of color." This has not been exceeded, even by Gov. Hamilton of Texas. But Gov. Marvin takes pains to deny that the negro is constitutionally a liar, and refers to his experience of thirty years at the South, part of which were spent upon the bench, and in which he had been satisfied that the slave had often told the truth while the master had lied. He had often deplored the cheating of justice by the exclusion of negro testimony. "Keep the negro out of court, and what chance has he for justice?" he asks, and answers: "Just none at all." If the constitution fails to incorporate this reform, the governor holds that it would not provide a republican form of government, and he would be content to see it rejected, on that account, by Congress. Gov. Brownlow, in his message to the General Assembly of Tennessee, on the 2d, recommends that body to revise the entire State code, and adapt it to the requirements of freedom. Especially does he urge the propriety and necessity of admitting the freedmen to the courts, contending that much of the repugnance to their admission is the result of education and habit. "In short," he says, "let us demand for this long oppressed race the protection and enjoyment of their liberty." The governor's remarks on negro suffrage are distinguished by great candor, outgrowth from old prejudices, and undoubted sincerity. We should like to reproduce them entire, but can only give their substance. He argues the case for Tennessee alone, and concludes that Congress has no authority to determine the qualifications of suffrage for that State. He thinks that one of the great results of the rebellion will be the bestowal of the franchise upon the freedmen, but the time has not come when this ignorant population can safely be entrusted with the ballot. Nevertheless, there is a class of them whom he would be willing to see vote at once. Furthermore:

"I am free to confess that if it become necessary to enfranchise the blacks in order to keep the control of the country out of the hands of the rebels and traitors, I am for the measure. And when the nation finds that all its liberality and offers of pardon to rebels are in vain, it will take steps to give suffrage to the blacks, and I shall cordially approve the act."

The governor shows the absurdity of that unchangeable hostility to the measure which is so often avowed, by recalling the practices of various States, North and South, in times within easy memory. We commend this sentence to "A Yankee" correspondent of the London Spectator:

"All this outcry against a negro voting in any contingency comes from a lingering sentiment of disloyalty in the South, added to ancient prejudices, and to the savage instincts inspired by this institution in connection with the rebellion."

Colonization is alluded to, and a scheme similar to Gen. Cox's suggested. Gov. Brownlow would either avenge the boast of Texas, that slavery could never be abolished, by confiscating her rebel lands, buying out the loyal, and planting the freedmen upon them; or have the Government "clean out" Mexico for the same purpose, since "the advent of Maximilian into Mexico was a part of the rebellion."

"But if the colored man, after looking over the whole ground, shall still ask to stay in the land of his birth, to till the soil and labor in the workshop, and to fill positions of usefulness under the bright sky that smiled on his infancy, I say, in all conscience, let him remain."

Let us notice, as pertaining to the message rather than to the theme with which we started, the governor's appeal to the Assembly to stay the great flood of intemperance which has swollen with the war until it now threatens to swamp the morality of the State, and which daily imperils the lives of its citizens, and of all who travel in its public conveyances.

We read somewhere, a few weeks since, of the introduction on a Western railway of a contrivance for taking up and depositing the mail without checking the speed of the train. If we remember rightly, the invention was said to be of English origin. On the ninth of last month, this apparatus, which is ascribed to the ingenuity of the post-office in Wigan, Lancashire, failed lamentably to work in the case of a bag containing the northern mail, which was torn apart, and discharged its letters not quite as contemplated, for most of them were so mutilated that neither contents nor address was legible.

Without approving of strikes in general, one might be pardoned for rejoicing at the combination of theatrical managers who have withdrawn their patronage from the Herald. Mr. Maretzek found his controversy and separation a very decided gain; and when the editor, still ruffled, doubtless, by the impresario's attacks, turned Mr. Barnum out of his columns from private spite, he found that he dismissed at the same time a number of managers who made common cause with the showman. To which demonstrations the Herald replies as usual that it makes enough money to snap its fingers at public opinion.

Bishop Wilmer, of Georgia, being unable to pray for the President and all in civil authority, so long as the Federal troops remained in the State, and having advised the clergy of his diocese to join him in omitting this prayer, he and they have been suspended from their functions until they come to their senses. They are forbidden, by an order from Major-Gen. Woods, to preach or perform divine service, and their churches are closed till they manifest symptoms of repentance, and a sincere return to their allegiance.

Mr. Blair has replied to Mr. Holt's defence, but fails to weaken it materially, even by repeating the charges of his Clarksville speech. He dwells longest, and, as he imagines, most damagingly, on the private letter to a clergyman in the crisis betwixt secession and the outbreak of the war. It is safe to affirm that Mr. Holt would never be guilty of such folly again, but it is now clear it was only folly, and not complicity with the rebellion. Good and loyal men, who were under the spell of slavery, were made to act very ridiculously and (let us confess to Mr. Blair) very dangerously from nervous excitement and dread of the impending conflict. Mr. Holt did desire, in order to avert war, the repeal of the personal liberty laws, and such concessions to slavery as would practically have nullified the voice of the dominant party at the polls. But a man could do this honestly and ignorantly without treasonable intent. His characterizing the abolition agitation as "infernal," together with the demands upon the North just mentioned, were familiar to the thoughts and lips of every Southerner, of high or low degree, including those whose champion Mr. Blair assumes to be against the radicals—the loyal majority who were dragooned into rebellion. Yet their undeniable sentiments in regard to the Republican party, its platform, its chosen candidate, its legislation against the spread of slavery, might as well be quoted against their natural fidelity to the Union as against Mr. Holt's. Where, too, shall we stop if we rake up the records of even four years ago? What confidence could we have in the President, whose speeches on the floor of Congress in the midst of the secession excitement cannot safely be quoted now for the vanquisher of slavery and the doctrine of State supremacy, or for the successor of Abraham Lincoln? We would not say that these reminiscences ought not to temper our judgment of the character of our public men, and make us cautious in trusting them. But it is ill to taunt those who have made indubitable advances towards the right with the mire they have left, rather than to welcome their arrival on terra firma.

The Louisiana Democratic Convention met in New Orleans on the 3d. They approved of the President's policy, a white man's government, compensation for losses by emancipation, a general amnesty and restoration of property, and organized opposition to the radical Republican party. They also renominated J. M. Wells, the present governor. On the same day the State election took place in Mississippi, quietly. Gen. Humphreys was chosen governor over Judge Fisher, though he is really ineligible to office, because he never was pardoned. A Union representative was returned for the Fourth District. The North Carolina Convention assembled on the 2d. It did nothing till Friday, when it declared that the secession ordinance of May 20, 1861, "is now, and at all times ever hath been, null and void." On Saturday it abolished and prohibited slavery.

Thucydides tells us that one effect of the Greek seditions and intestine wars was to change the accustomed value of words and give them arbitrary significations. Thus, blind fury was called good partisanship; prudence, specious cowardice; and so on. Such transformations may have been a novelty in the days of the ancient historian, but they are common enough now. Sometimes they give rise to queer mistakes in the interpretation of literature not so very far removed from our own generation. A slight change in the force of one little word ("rake") has induced superficial critics to charge Pope with a malignant libel on all womankind. Sometimes we see the alteration taking place, as here in New York the term alderman, once a title of respect, is now rapidly becoming synonymous with thief or scoundrel. Perhaps the most striking metamorphoses take place (for obvious reasons) in words denoting political differences and social distinctions. The latter especially are apt to be modified in passing from England to America, from a country where the lines of social demarcation are rigidly drawn to one in which they are somewhat confused. By the next century certain English words expressing class distinctions may very possibly reverse and interchange their meanings altogether in popular and conversational American, as they have already done partially. Gentleman may come to mean a rude, dirty, and illiterate individual; perfect gentleman, a ruffian or alderman; man or fellow, a respectable and well-informed person; snob, a highly refined and accomplished man. Such change would, of course, be hastened if Great Britain were meantime annihilated by the Fenians, the Panama Canal, or other agency. And should this seem to any one a farcical exaggeration, let him reflect on the changes, equally fundamental, which we have undergone in our political vocabulary. Can there be a more complete revolution in meaning than that by which, in forty years, the word democrat came to mean on this side of the Atlantic an upholder of oligarchy and slavery? In Europe it still retains its original meaning, because no European democrats ever tasted the sweets of power long enough to substitute organization for principle. The moral of all which is, that the study of words, which some educational reformers affect to despise, often becomes a matter of much practical importance.

Our account of Gen. Howard's tour of inspection in Virginia left him in Richmond, on his return from Gordonsville. He immediately visited Petersburg, to meet the Mayor, Common Council, and prominent gentlemen of the city; afterwards met at Norfolk the local authorities and those of Portsmouth; and in both instances explained the objects of his Bureau, asked for co-operation, and expressed his peaceful desires for the people of the South. Crossing over to Fortress Monroe, he visited Hampton, in company with Gen. Miles, riding about the town to the various negro localities, and ascertaining their condition and needs. In this vicinity are several thousand negroes, mostly the wives and families of soldiers now serving in Texas. Gen. Howard returned to Washington on Saturday, Sept. 30.

Major Miller, of Gen. Swayne's staff, was sent, it will be remembered, on a tour of inspection through the western part of Alabama, the scene of reported outrages on the freedmen. He left Mobile on the 8th of September, with one company of mounted infantry. The next day he arrived at Mount Vernon, a neighborhood in which the freedmen were doing well: they were remaining at home, and were generally contented. They mostly work for a portion of the crop, varying from a tenth to a fourth, besides food, clothing, and quarters. At a meeting of the principal planters, Major Miller made known the object of his mission. Near McIntosh's Bluff, he saw by the roadside a new-made grave, and learned that it contained the body of Dr. Grierson, a Union man, and a leading citizen of Washington County, who had been basely murdered a few days before. Efforts had been made by his neighbors to arrest the murderer, but without success. The northern part of the same county is in a deplorable condition. Crops are worthless, and lawless bands of men go about robbing and taking life. Within fifteen miles of St. Stephens, a fortnight before, a negro, formerly the slave of a Mr. Fletcher, returned to the plantation to get his wife. He was resisted by his late master, who shot him, and afterwards cut off his head. A military force sought to arrest the barbarian, but he eluded their pursuit. Affairs in Choctaw County were also found in an unsatisfactory state. Few are willing to accept the issue of the contest. "I should exaggerate little," remarks the major, "were I to say I met many who hardly knew the war was ended." In Clark County, the negroes were for the most part prospering and contented. At Grove Hill, the capital, he received promises of aid from several gentlemen of standing, among whom Judge Beltes, of the Probate Court, was particularly hearty. Here the civil government is running very smoothly; all of the officers are qualified, and profess a desire to second the efforts of the general Government in reconstruction. At Claiborne, the exhibitions of disloyalty were so open and aggravating that the major with great difficulty prevented an outbreak between his escort and the citizens. Some fifteen miles further on, his wagon-master was shot dead by two ruffians on horseback, at a house to which he had gone for a drink of water. His wagons were scarcely out of sight when the murder was committed. The perpetrators could not be traced. Major Miller says that the returned Confederate soldiers are the best men he found in the district traversed; they are generally supporters of the Government.

Gen. Howard is so well satisfied with the condition of the freedmen and refugees in Missouri that he has given orders for the withdrawal of the officers of the Bureau who are now in that State. Gen. Sprague will leave St. Louis for Little Rock, Arkansas, where he will make his headquarters.

Gen. Fullerton, of the office in Washington, and Brevet Brig.-Gen. Strong, the Inspector-General, have started for New Orleans, to investigate the freedmen's affairs in that city. Gen. Howard has undertaken another tour of inspection, which will embrace most of the Southern States, and will last a month or six weeks.

Gov. Parsons' opinion of the Assistant Commissioner for Alabama is given in these words:

"I take pleasure in assuring you that the administration of Gen. Swayne has been eminently satisfactory. In the execution of his orders, and in the solution of the many perplexing questions which are constantly presented to him, he has exhibited a wisdom, a consideration, and a delicacy which have obtained, to a remarkable extent, the confidence of the people."

It may not be generally known that the Government has established in Washington an intelligence office for freed people. It is in charge of Capt. W. F. Spurgeon, and has already done much good in getting employment for the idle. For the ten days ending Sept. 30, he had one hundred and twenty-nine applications for employment, of which sixty-seven were filled. A similar office was opened in Alexandria on the 2d, and had business the first day.

Circular No. 16, issued from the Bureau Sept. 20, does not concern the general public, as it consists of directions for the keeping of accounts by assistant commissioners and their subordinates.

A circular letter of Oct. 4, from the same source, is as follows:

"State laws with regard to apprenticeship will be recognized by this Bureau, provided they make no distinction of color, or, in case they do so, the said laws applying to white children will be extended to the colored.

"Officers of this Bureau are regarded as guardians of orphan minors of freedmen within their respective districts.

"The principle to be adhered to with regard to paupers is, that each county, parish, township, or city shall care for and provide for its own poor.

"Vagrant laws made for free people, and now in force in the statute-books of the States embraced in the operations of this Bureau, will be recognized and extended to the freedmen.

"Assistant commissioners will draw up specific instructions applicable to their respective States, in accordance with the foregoing principles."

The Emperor of Austria, in a manifesto dated Vienna, Sept. 20, admits the ill-success of his endeavors to unify his realm by his diploma of Oct. 20, 1860, and his patent of the following February. The lesser Reichsrath has not been attended by certain provinces, and therefore has failed to accomplish its constitutional design. The Emperor now suspends this body altogether. in order that he may lay before the Hungarian and Croatian Diet the diploma and patent for their acceptance, it being, as he observes, "judicially impossible to have one and the same definition a subject of debate in one part of the empire, while in other parts it is treated as an imperial law, binding upon all." The French press continues to make the convention of Gastein its chief topic of discussion. Circular dispatches, addressed by Earl Russell and M. Drouyn de Lhuys to the diplomatic agents of England and France respectively, have been published. They are of the same tenor, and were evidently concerted. They pronounce the partition of the duchies to be simply an act of violence and conquest, in defiance of all law and in defence of none, unmindful both of the interests of Germany and of the duchies, whose wishes were either not consulted or arbitrarily disregarded, and altogether a proceeding "that finds a precedent only in the most deplorable ages in history." The feeling excited by the death of the servant Otto, who was killed quite wantonly by the Count d'Eulenburg, at Bonn, Rhenish Prussia, about the middle of August, still prevails. The Mayor of Strasburg, to which city Otto, who was a French subject, belonged, addressed a note to M. Drouyn de Lhuys on the 5th of September, setting forth the local indignation at the manslaughter, and the subsequent liberty accorded to the count by the Prussian Government and courts, apparently because he was the nephew of the secretary of state. The French minister replies that he had already instructed his ambassador at Berlin that the Emperor would not suffer this crime to go unpunished, and that he has written again to be informed of what is being done in the case. The official excuse is that both parties were intoxicated at the time, and exchanged blows with the admitted effect. The Russian Government has taken an important step towards centralization or the homogeneousness of its diverse parts. By an imperial ukase, the locality now occupied by the Cossacks of Orenburg is transformed into a simple "government," or, as we should say, county, like those into which Central Russia is subdivided. The political significance of this change lies in the fact that the Cossacks have hitherto been indulged in their republican, communistic autonomy, in return for their devotion to the empire and their prompt furnishing of contingents for the grand army. The Cossacks of Orenburg have been least independent, or have fewer traditions of independence, and the Government therefore makes the exporiment with them, with the view, not concealed, of extending it to their brethren of the Don and the Black Sea if it proves successful The law which mitigates the censorship of the press in Russia has two provisions which detract greatly from its seeming liberality. The minister of the interior is empowered, of his own authority and without assigning a reason, to forbid a newspaper to insert announcements, and to withdraw from it the right of receiving its exchanges from abroad without censure.

M. Rogeard, who improved the holiday granted by despotism to letters to indite the "Discourse of Labienus," and was obliged to quit France for Belgium, has been disturbed even in that retreat. His new offence consisted of a satire, "Pauvre France," which seems to have piqued the Belgian Government as much as it rasped its neighbor. Here is a passage from its preface:

"I detest the French Empire, because, like all monarchies, and more than any, it leans upon the seven institutions, the seven scourges of modern society, which cause populations to live and die, the seven cursed columns of the accursed edifice, and which are the permanent army, salaried clergy, irremovable magistracy, centralized administration, the police, prostitution, and organized pauperism."

When the order to leave the country within twenty-four hours was communicated to Rogeard, he published this declaration:

"I have defended liberty of conscience in France; I have defended it in Belgium; I shall defend it everywhere and to the end, to the extent of my power. I received this morning a royal decree, deliberated upon by the Council of Ministers, by which I am arbitrarily expelled from Belgium. I declare that I shall remain in Belgium, in my dwelling. I declare that I shall protest against this arbitrary conduct by all the means that shall be at my command; that I shall await the employment of public force; that I shall not leave, save at my own time; and that I shall only yield to violence. I consider that I have a duty to fulfil toward the Belgian people, and I shall fulfil it. I have a debt of gratitude to discharge toward Belgian public opinion. I desire to declare this publicly, and if I cannot hope to pay it, I wish at least not to be considered ungrateful. I shall, therefore, do what I ought for the cause of liberty in all countries, and what I owe to hospitality in Belgium. I shall resist arbitrary proceedings, and shall protest in all form, and shall not leave until I am arrested."

On the evening of the 14th ult., a popular gathering in sympathy and protest took place before his residence, and was addressed by the courageous pamphleteer. Nevertheless, at five the next morning, the police had conveyed him to the station and packed him off to Germany.

French mechanics have given their English fellow-craftsmen a second "Gladiator" defeat. The Government of the grand duchy of Baden issued proposals for forty-six locomotives. An English offer was received to build them at 70,720 francs a piece; another, from Baden itself, at 55,720; and a third, from the works at Graffenstaden, in Alsace, at 45,000. The job was divided between the two latter, and the English competitor got nothing.

The serious theatrical disturbances at Lyons have been somewhat epidemical. Even in Paris, a mob was inclined to be boisterous and disorderly because Thérèse, the ill-favored, unmusical pet of the pot-house and the salon, did not answer promptly their summons: "A la porte!" A sergeant of gendarmes restored their humor by vociferating "All those who want to hiss here will please go elsewhere!" At Avignon, the municipal authorities have regulated demonstrations in the theatre in a truly novel way. During the performance, applause alone is permitted. At the close, the audience will be "invited" to express their opinion. The manager, list in hand, will pronounce the names of the actors, and await the verdict of the spectators, which must be confined to hissing, if unfavorable, and last no longer than five minutes.

The proprietor of a publication in the West writes to us that "he would like to be able to use a notice of his paper from The Nation," and enquires "whether we cannot give him a lift." This is an excellent expression of the current notions of the functions of a critic. Flattering as the request may be, we are compelled to refuse compliance. We do n't pretend to be able to give anybody "a lift" in The Nation. When we see authors and editors "lifting" themselves, we call the attention of the public to the fact; and in like manner, when we see them floundering in the mud, we feel it our duty to mention it, even at the risk of hurting their feelings.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

THE CONNECTICUT VOTE.

As it was only by the most extraordinary exertions on the part of the Republicans that Connecticut was prevented from throwing its weight into the scale on the side of the rebellion during the war, the result of the vote on the amendment to the Constitution need not surprise anybody, and has, we think, surprised nobody very much. In fact, the interest with which the result was looked for was due mainly to the fact that her notorious weakness on the whole Southern question, and the bad eminence she has won in times past by her devotion to Southern ideas, would have given any testimony that she might render on behalf of justice and right an unusual value. If she, who was the first to imitate South Carolina in her repudiation of democratic principles, had, on Monday last, frankly acknowledged her error, of course it would have done more than any other event which is now likely to occur to strengthen the hands of those who seek to reconstruct Southern society on the basis of human equality. But her failure to do so has certainly been no great disappointment to those who are familiar with her antecedents. Why it is that Connecticut, with all her advantages, historical, mental, moral, and material—furnishing, as she has done, so many distinguished names to the roll of American worthies—should as a State have displayed so much tenderness for most forms of legalized rascality, and should have so large a proportion of her population bitterly hostile to liberal ideas, is a question we have never yet heard satisfactorily answered, and is one of the most inscrutable problems of American politics. Her action last week will unquestionably strengthen the hands of those who desire to see the South back in the Union on any terms, and who care not what form of polity Union covers. It will help to confirm the President in his determination, if he has really formed one, to carry out his present plan, and will throw into the ranks of the party of caste that large horde of political "bummers," whose great object is, in every contest, to be on the winning side, and who would clamor as loudly for including horses in the basis of suffrage as they now do for the exclusion of negroes from the polls, if they thought that measure likely to secure a majority. But for all that, Connecticut has not done half as much mischief by voting nay as she might have done good by voting yea. In other words, she is not half as formidable as an enemy as she might have proved valuable as a friend.

The Connecticut majority may congratulate themselves, too, on having furnished the enemies of the country abroad with that very ammunition of which, since the issue of the Emancipation Proclamation, they have stood so sorely in need. Some tangible, formal evidence of the hypocrisy of Northern professions of respect for human rights is the very thing they have been seeking in vain, and in the Connecticut vote they will certainly flatter themselves that they have found it. The delight with which the declaration of the New York correspondent of the London Spectator, that the best people at the North held the negro in "unutterable loathing," has been received by the Tory press in England, may help to furnish an idea of the joy with which they will hear of the declaration of a New England State that a man is not fit to vote in our model republic, no matter what his mental or moral qualities may be, if his skin be dark. The "effete and bloated aristocrat," whom we are so much in the habit of lecturing upon his pride, prejudice, and selfishness, may certainly take courage and hold up his head, when he finds that so large a body of good New Englanders are ready to retain in their polity a distinction a thousand times more odious and absurd than any which European aristocracy has yet ventured to establish. The motives which actuate a "gentleman" in withholding a share in the government from a laborer may be defended by arguments; but when Connecticut democrats bestow the citizenship on the stupidest and dirtiest and most ignorant white men that come in their way, while withholding it from the most respectable and intelligent black, they are able to boast that they have hit upon a form of injustice so utterly absurd as to save them the trouble of defending it.

For the wrong done to the Connecticut negroes, in this matter, we care very little. Their number is small, and many of them, doubtless, feel themselves to be amply compensated by their exemption from taxation for their exclusion from the honor of citizenship. The positive loss and damage to individuals that would have resulted from the collection of the ship-money, the enforcement of the stamp act, or the legalization of general warrants, would have been very trifling. And yet there has never been a generation of our race who would not have died to the last man sooner than submit to any one of them. For the objections, too, of those who shrink from negro suffrage on account of negro ignorance, there is much to be said. And it is, therefore, not as the advocates of negro rights that we deplore what has just occurred; it is as the advocates of democratic principles. Our political system can, in our opinion, stand foreign war, domestic treason, the march of time, almost every agency, in fact, under which other empires have crumbled; but it cannot and will not resist the open repudiation of its vital principles by those who live under it. The deliberate adoption by the people of the United States, we repeat, of the doctrine that an accident of birth, or appearance, ought to exclude a man from civil rights, is a virtual surrender of the democratic idea itself.

This unpleasant fact is now glossed over or hidden altogether by the general contempt for the negro; but the negro has in reality, quoad negro, very little to do with the matter. The important point in it is that, in shutting him out for a physical peculiarity, and refusing to allow him by any exertion or acquirement to cure this defect, if defect it be, we broadly deny that all men are equal, or fit for self-government, or entitled to it, even under the most favorable circumstances; we assert that the government ought not in all cases to rest on the consent of the governed; that it may be seized and held by a class of the community, and that this class may be distinguished from the rest simply by birth, or complexion, or social position. Now this is the English, Prussian, or Austrian idea of government; it is certainly not the idea we have been preaching with such tremendous power of lungs for the last half century, which we have been abusing old Europe for not adopting, and of which we have been lustily proclaiming ourselves the champions for the last four years. We are guilty of no exaggeration when we say that the Earl of Derby or Herr von Bismarck might state his argument against the extension of the suffrage to the lower classes in England and Prussia in the same terms, mutatis mutandis, in which an able American conservative now states them against negro suffrage.

There is one consolation, however, of which no majority by which any form of wrong may be supported can in this age of the world ever deprive those who love principles—and who believe, as we believe, that it is only by faithfully seeking and firmly grasping them that salvation can ever come either to men or nations. It is, that in our day neither custom, nor privilege, nor oppression, no matter what shape they may assume, can take up any position impregnable to free speech. Against this neither legislation, nor majorities, nor armies, nor fleets will avail. We have at last got it in America. Now, for the first time in our history, there is no corner of the Union in which a man may not speak the thing he wills. If we can but keep this weapon in our hands, we shall as assuredly break down aristocracy at the South, and break down class feeling here, as we broke down slavery; and even if it were wrested from us there, we still should never despair as long as we retained it at the North. Our triumph may be more distant than we imagined it to be, but it is sure. The President, and Congress, and State conventions, and "leading statesmen" can do much, but they cannot put the conscience of the nation to sleep. Christianity has not yet done for the modern world all it ought to have done, but it has at least conferred on it a moral sensibility to which the ancient world was a stranger, and which, amongst us, renders long protracted injustice impossible if justice can raise its voice.

DECREASE IN THE PUBLIC DEBT.

SECRETARY MCCULLOCH'S official schedule of the public debt of the United States to 30th September exhibits the first positive decrease in the grand total since the beginning of the troubles of 1861-65. The amount is now twelve and a half millions less than at the close of August, and $255,000,000 less than the three thousand millions which was generally esteemed a few months ago the minimum total on the settlement of the war. The figures were:

On August 31, 1865, - - - - -	$2,757,689,571
On September 30, 1865, - - - - -	2,744,947,726
Decrease, - - - - - -	$12,741,845

On the present settlement, the unpaid requisitions on the Treasury amount to only $1,220,000. On the conclusion of the war in May they were $40,150,000. The balances then in the Treasury were $25,148,702; they are now $88,977,230.

The actual decrease in the public debt in September, in the face of continued heavy payments in settlement of the closing expenses of the war and the disbanding of the army, is mainly due to the large internal revenues of the month and the receipts in gold from imports; the latter being so far in excess of the wants of the gold interest charge on the public debt that they were converted into currency by the sale of $12,000,000 or $15,000,000 gold in the open market. We should not make haste to congratulate the country on the arrest of the public debt in August, and its first evidence of decrease in September, if we had reason to suppose that any considerable claims against the Government had been postponed, or their audit at Washington purposely delayed; but the evidences of the promptness, and even anxiety, of the Secretary on these points are all against any such suspicion. Nor should we rejoice so soon at these results, if we had reason to believe that the October receipts from taxes and customs would fall off so materially as to render it impracticable for the Secretary to make an equally good exhibit at the end of the present month. The evidences of the first week in the month are in the opposite direction. The internal revenues continue to pour into the Treasury at the rate of $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 per day, and the gold customs of the first week are over three millions of dollars, equal to nearly $4,500,000 in currency. The November interest on the public debt being already anticipated, the Secretary will, no doubt, continue his sales of gold until the close approach of the first of January, when the next instalment of gold interest falls due. And altogether we regard it as quite certain that another moderate reduction on the total of the debt, and a very considerable curtailment of legal tender paper, will appear on the succeeding schedule.

The Secretary has wisely, we think, initiated a policy of funding, and thus directly contracting the compound and other interest-bearing notes, authorized as legal tender currency; the sum total assigned to the present month being fifty millions, of which ten millions have already been deposited for exchange or funding into gold-bearing 6 per cent. U. S. 5-20s at the rate of 103 per cent. In addition to this process, the sum of five millions in ordinary greenbacks was withdrawn from circulation in September, and a like sum is probably contemplated in the present month. These beginnings of curtailment in Government paper, together with the gradual withdrawal of the old local bank paper-money, will, it is believed, soon more than qualify the growth of the national bank currency, which was designed to supersede all local bank paper, as well as to facilitate the ultimate withdrawal of Government greenbacks, after the necessities which gave rise to legal tender shall have been altogether removed by the near approach to the nominal specie standard of the country.

On this last point, we believe the purpose of the Secretary is to move with deliberation as well as on sound conservative views. There must be a large amount of funding into permanent public stocks before his action can be made wholly free by the removal of his temporary obligations in the shape of circulation, certificates of indebtedness and deposit, and to this end he must have the assistance and support of Congress in the institution of an ample and comprehensive system of finance and taxation, looking to and fully authorizing a consolidated public debt, bearing no higher uniform rate of interest in gold than five per cent. There is only one class of United States 6 per cent. stocks now outstanding which will not authorize such a consolidation in from two to eight years from the present time, and this class is of the 6 per cents of 1881, amounting to about one-tenth of the present total of the public debt, or $282,746,000. Of the other 6 per cents, $514,780,500 original 5-20s can be redeemed in gold, or reduced to 5 per cents, at any time after May 1, 1867. And of the 7.30 per cent. Treasury notes convertible into 5-20s, $300,000,000 will be redeemable after August 15, 1872; $300,000,000 after June 15, 1873; and the remainder, $230,000,000, after July 15, 1873.

PRUSSIA.

POLITICAL events in Prussia have lately attracted public attention. Their importance is ordinarily either undervalued or overrated, owing to the limited interest taken in the historical antecedents out of which they have grown, and by which alone they can be justly appreciated.

The war of 1813 to 1815 raised all the issues now occupying the political mind of Prussia. The people learned to feel their power. They had risen to expel the invader in answer to an earnest appeal dictated to the stolid king by his energetic counsellors. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, a second appeal called forth another effort, equally successful. Prompted either by policy or by gratitude, he issued, on the 22d of May, 1815, a formal promise of a constitution, in acknowledgment of the services of his subjects.

This promise he failed to perform, alleging, first, that the people who had bled to uphold his throne were not ripe for constitutional liberty, and, afterwards, that they had done their simple duty, and merited no reward. But, incautiously or unavoidably, he gave a mortgage to secure the ultimate execution of his contract. In funding the national debt, in the year 1820, he laid it down as an article of compact with the fundholders that new loans should not be made, nor the annual budget increased beyond the sum of fifty-five millions of thalers, without the consent of the popular representatives. For years the limit was not exceeded; but subsequently the greater development of the national resources, especially since the adoption of the Zollverein (1833), swept over the ancient landmarks; at the king's decease the annual expense of government exceeded by twenty per cent. the maximum fixed by his own edict; but he preferred suppressing the budget to making good his word.

This strait-laced, spiritless drill-sergeant, the roughness of whose manner had given him a sort of popularity in spite of the palpable obliquity of his moral sense, was succeeded, in 1840, by his son Frederic William IV., a product of the perverted intellectual tendencies of the nineteenth century, a scheming Puseyite in religion as well as in politics, filled with admiration of Gothic architecture and pre-Raphaelite paintings, bent upon the restoration of the mediæval estates of the realm, and progressive only in his aversion to the humdrum of the absolutistic bureaucracy. A man of some humor and wit, and of erudition almost beyond his powers of intellectual digestion, good at an after-dinner speech, and covetous of personal applause, he would have made his mark as a private citizen. Vain, effeminate, uncertain of purpose, feeble of will even to cowardice, artful, faithless to his ministers, and inexhaustible in projects, which always failed, he received from his brother-in-law, the Emperor Nicholas, the sobriquet of "Widow Cliquot"—felicitous not only because he loved the wine, but because he was lacking in manhood and manliness. His efforts to embellish his capital, to restore the fortunes of impoverished families, to complete cathedral churches, and to rebuild the castles of the Rhine, involved expenditures which his bankers at length prosaically refused to defray. As a last resource for raising money, he issued the patent of February 3, 1847, uniting the "estates" or feudal representative assemblies of the separate provinces into a single diet, which he affected to regard as not only competent, under the edict of 1820, to authorize new loans, but also as qualified to disarm the political opposition which could no longer be safely disregarded.

The new king's own coronation oratory had done much to draw off the attention of aspiring Germans from the problems of Hegelian speculation to the political issues of the day. The celebrated "Four Questions" of Dr. Jacoby, of Koenigsberg, a noble champion of popular rights, who is at this present writing imprisoned for having advised his constituents to refuse the payment of taxes unconstitutionally imposed, fell like a bomb-shell into the still life of Prussian office-holders. They asked why the constitution, to which the people had acquired a vested right by virtue of a solemn compact made in the hour of danger, was not accorded in the hour of security. The cry was eagerly taken up by the liberal press; the ranks of the opposition were swelled from day to day; and, in a few years after 1840, a great liberal party assembled around its standard the great majority of the industrial and working classes, of the civil functionaries, and of the aspiring talent of the country. In the view of these men, it was a grave question whether the patent of 1847 ought to be accepted in fulfilment of the royal pledge or repudiated as an evasion of it. Henry Simon, a judge of very high standing, passed judgment upon the measure in saying, "If a child ask his father for bread, will he give him a stone?"

No sooner was the diet organized than the king discovered that he had sowed the wind, and was reaping the whirlwind. Though composed of country gentlemen, farmers, crown ministers, and public functionaries, the majority asserted a right to grant or withhold taxes, and to adopt or reject the budget. While the crown was struggling to extricate itself from this new dilemma, the revolution of 1848 swept over the continent. After a battle of two days in the streets of Berlin, the king succumbed to the popular demands, which, however, were confused and ill-digested. A legislative assembly was convoked; but the new ministers, selected from the industrial classes and the gentry, feared the popular passions and the socialistic vagaries naturally promulgated on all hands, more than the absolutistic tendencies of the king and the reactionary hankerings of the aristocracy. Thus their influence became subservient to the design of the latter, and offered no resistance to the coup d'état by which the king dispersed the assembly and forestalled the adoption of the new constitution. The dissensions between the middle classes and the working-men prostrated them at the feet of absolute power. The reaction spread over all Europe. The election of Louis Napoleon and the overthrow of the Hungarians restored the equanimity of the European cabinets, and once more arrayed them in solid phalanx against the progress of liberty.

Even the constitution violently imposed by Frederic William in December, 1848, was found to be too liberal for the times, and was supplanted by another proclaimed in January, 1850, which is nominally still in force, and is worthy of its origin. Administered for a number of years by a ministry headed by Baron Mannteufel, it ushered in one of the most ignominious periods of Prussian history. Chained to the car of Russia, and degraded to the rank of a third-rate power, the government expended its energies in endeavoring to eradicate the self-government of the towns and communes, the freedom of the press and of public assemblage, and every vestige of the revolutionary era. State sophists and schoolmen, some of them, like Stahel, being converted Jews, labored to explain away the remnants of constitutional rights, and to inculcate an unquestioning obedience which knows no personal responsibility, and reposes implicit confidence in the superior wisdom of those in authority. Thus the pretence of constitutional government became a mere farce. The democratic party, by refusing to vote, on the ground that the constitution was a mere arbitrary edict, binding on no one, unwisely played into the hands of the government, and enabled the latter to pack with its dependents the popular assembly, which thus received the appellation of the "Landrathskammer" ("Chamber of Prefects"). The political degradation was aggravated, or at least made the more apparent, by unprecedented prosperity in all commercial and industrial pursuits; absorbed in the pursuit of gain, the middle classes were callous to the humiliation of Prussia during the Crimean war. The reaction was at its height when, in the fall of 1857, a softening of the brain extinguished the erratic genius of the Prussian king. Was it a physical process or a physiological development? Was it remorse, or was it simply the running to seed of a diseased organization? Frederic William, himself averse to military life, was yet so far entangled in the military traditions of his family, that he imagined himself to be Sergeant Lehman of the Guards, unsuccessful in the effort to pass an examination for a lieutenancy, and wandered about the garden of Sanssouci muttering: "Lehman, Lehman, you ought to be ashamed of yourself." He died on New Year's day of 1860, three years after the government had passed into the hands of his brother William, as regent. Of the career of the latter we shall speak hereafter.

LEGAL FICTIONS.

Nothing has been more remarkable during the war than the rapidity with which "legal fictions" sprang up as the strife progressed. Generally the sword tears all the lawyer's fine-spun webs to pieces, and lays the naked facts of the case before the world, but our war has furnished an exception to the rule. When it broke out, there was a vague desire at the North to strike the enemy in some way or other through slavery; but everybody was afraid for a long time to say so. In 1861, he who talked either of taking away the slaves of the rebels, or even of not returning them if they ran away, incurred imminent risk of being considered a fool or a "vandal." In the midst of the general perplexity came General Butler, and covered himself with glory, and diffused general comfort through the community, by pronouncing the negro "contraband of war." To have retained a runaway as a man would have shocked everybody; but to retain him as "matériel" satisfied all consciences. Everybody knew it was a fiction, the humbug of the thing was transparent; but if the general had discovered the art of shooting round a corner, he could not have filled the public with greater envy and admiration than that excited by the invention of this potent phrase.

When the Emancipation Proclamation was issued, it gave a prodigious impetus to fiction-mongering. To have said openly and frankly that it was desirable to abolish slavery because slavery was a sin and a curse to the community—a constant source of danger and corruption—would have thrown thousands into convulsions. So, long and elaborate pamphlets were written to show that the Southern negroes stood in the position of mules and oxen, and that when Mr. Lincoln sought to take them away from their masters, far from being guilty of using his power to give freedom to slaves, he was simply depriving the enemy of so many head of cattle, which, as a general, he had a right to do.

A little later, it became necessary to try a number of great scoundrels for frauds and other offences calculated to diminish the efficiency of the army. For some reason or other, it was found disagreeable to say that the country was under martial law, so it was pretended that all contractors, and even all persons who sold anything to the Government, newspaper correspondents, and such like, were in the naval or military service of the United States, and therefore subject to trial by court martial, no matter where they exercised their vocation. We remember last winter hearing "a rising young lawyer" produce before a large audience a little fiction, which for rare and curious workmanship could hardly be matched out of China. In order to make the would-be assassin of Mr. Seward liable to trial by court martial, he laid it down that anybody who attacked a military officer of the United States in time of war became, ipso facto, amenable to military jurisdiction. Mr. Seward was a military officer of the United States, inasmuch as he countersigned "orders" of the President, who was commander-in-chief, ergo, etc.

Mr. Seward himself, with the lawyer's habit of mind still strong upon him, occasionally turns out a fiction himself which may compare favorably with the best efforts of the profession; as when, the other day, he denied that the Confederate Government had ever been a de facto government, because the United States had always refused to "recognize it" as such. Now, a fact is a fact, whether it be recognized or not; and if the rebels were able to raise armies, and fight battles, and collect taxes, they were de facto a government, though the whole of the rest of Christendom were to swear they were not. This may be unpleasant, but it was still a fact. If a man meets a drunken vagabond of a relation in the street, he may "ignore" him, but the rascal still remains in the flesh, and preserves his consciousness.

The latest and perhaps the best of all the fictions is the doctrine that the President is, in all his doings at the South, acting strictly in accordance with the law as laid down by the Constitution. This was invented by the conservatives for the purpose of bringing the radicals to confusion, by holding them up to the world as law-breakers or counsellors of law-breaking. The proposition that the Southern States should for any purpose be treated as conquered territory has accordingly been denounced as monstrous, the fact being that President Johnson's whole plan of reconstruction is based on the assumption that they are conquered territory. The real difference between him and his opponents is not as to the nature of his power, but as to the use he makes of it. There is no such officer as a "provisional governor" known to the Constitution of the United States. There is no machinery provided by the Constitution for imposing upon States "that have never been out of the Union" conditions of their re-admission to it. The notion that Mr. Johnson cannot interfere with the suffrage in the revolted States is pure double-refined fiction. "Fines and recoveries" were nothing to it. He is interfering with it for every purpose he pleases.

Correspondence.

A CORRECTION FROM GERRIT SMITH.

To the Editor of The Nation:

In your number of 21st instant, I see that you suppose me to be one of those who formerly held that "Congress could interfere with slavery in the States." I do not recollect that I ever so held. My doctrine was that slavery, the superlative piracy of earth, is not, and cannot be, LAW; that every Federal judge should, as occasion called for it, say so; and that the Federal Executive should sustain him in saying so.

There were but few with me in this doctrine. There are more now; and I shall yet be in the majority. Mankind will yet scout the idea that LAW—the most sacred of all sacred things—can give shelter to the greatest of all crimes. LAW, in whose presence all should reverently kneel, is now, alas! but little better than contemptible. Thus it will continue to be as long as slavery, which is worse than murder, shall be held to be capable of legalization. LAW will be a curse so long as the mass of men shall look upon it as the possible protector and upholder of the hugest lie and the intensest wickedness. It will be a priceless blessing when they shall see that, from its very nature, it must be, in all times and in all places, nothing else than the shrine and defence of truth and justice. THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

XIII.

CONCORD, N. C., Sept. 22, 1865.

HAVING determined to ride across from Charlotte to Raleigh by the country roads, it became necessary to retrace my steps for twenty miles, and pass again through Concord. An hour before I reached the village it was dark, and most of the houses were closed; but the stillness of the night, as I turned into the main street, was broken by sounds of loud singing that proceeded from the county jail. The words were those of a hymn, and the singers were evidently negroes. Going on to the hotel, I found two or three Federal soldiers in the office, who were regarded with no very friendly eyes by some citizen loungers, and I at once surmised that election day in Cabarrus County had not passed in perfect quiet. "Any disturbance here on Thursday, sir?" I asked the landlord. "No," he replied; "seen as much fifty times before. Always some whiskey out election times." In the dining room, eating a late supper, was a citizen of the town whose acquaintance I had made when here before, and of him I made the same enquiry. He said there had n't been no great trouble; not as he knew; some o' the black ones made a difficulty, but nobody was hurt. There war n't nothin' like what they 'd hed in Charlotte, and up here in Salisbury. Forenoon, election day, they run all the black ones out o' Salisbury. He 'd heerd the Yankees jined in, and they made a reg'lar cleanin'. I told him he must be mistaken so far as concerned Charlotte, that the election had been conducted very peaceably; and a soldier who had entered the room remarked that he had come from Salisbury on the evening of Thursday, and that no riot had occurred up to the time of his departure. This contradiction was not very well received, and I afterwards heard him repeating his story of riots in other counties to listeners who appeared not ill pleased at the information.

"How did the trouble begin, sir?"

"The commencement of it? I do n't know much about it anyhow; I did n't see it all myself, but I 've been told that the black ones was crowdin' down round the well, and a young man here in town told 'em to leave that and they would n't go, so he threw some water on one fellow, and that was what commenced it. The niggers was stubborn and sassy; come up, some o' 'em, with sticks; looked like they was ready prepared."

"Was there any shooting?"

"There was one man by the name o' Smith, he 's a Yankee too, I see him shoot once; yes, I believe he shot off two barrels, in the squar', but his pistol war n't loaded with ball, nothin' in it but blank cartridge. I see the sheriff start for him, and I run along too, so 's if the sheriff wanted any assistance, but before I got out thar whar he war at, I see as many as eight or ten or a dozen o' the niggers comin' over with rocks and sticks. I turned round to them, and told 'em to drap the rocks. They did n't do it, though they stood, so I drawed my pistol and told 'em agin, 'Boys, drap them rocks,' I said, 'or I 'll blow out your damn brains, some o' you;' and then they put 'em down. Well, a crowd came up by that time, and the niggers was run out o' town, and made a scatterment. That 's all the shootin' I see."

"I suppose the negroes carried the news to Charlotte?" "No, up to Salisbury. They went up that same evenin', and I heerd they told the Yankees that we 'd killed two niggers and wounded seven, and the fight was still going on when they left. But both of 'em 's known, and if they told any such story as I heerd say they told, they 'd better look, out. That 's the great trouble with the niggers, they tell too many lies to the Yankees, and the Yankees believe 'em. Let a nigger tell a lie on me; tell lies, and get me up before the Yankees. First nigger does it, I allow to shoot him. Yes, I do; I 'd hate to git into trouble on account of a nigger, nor I do n't want to make no trouble with 'em nuther, no more 'n with a white man, but they must n't lie on me. Their freedom 's made 'em so sassy there 's no livin' with 'em. I heerd that some of 'em 's been sayin' the niggers 'll rule the day here within two months' time. I just want one to say that to me. The niggers that talk like that 'll git killed certain; the people won't stan' that kind o' talk."

A little negro boy, a servant in the house, gives quite another account of the riot. He says that Mr. Worden, an agent of the Freedmen's Bureau, was expected to address the colored people at Concord on Thursday, and that a great many had come in to hear him, but that always on election day it has been customary for the negroes to have a holiday, and to watch the voting. He seems to have been too much frightened to observe the events of the riot with accuracy, and was inclined to "allow that all the black ones the sheriff put into the jail would ha' been done hung if the Yankees had n't come down." He is quite positive that the white men began the fray, and that the knocking down of an old negro was the signal for a general assault by about thirty men on all the negroes present. He speaks of one negro whose arm was broken by a pistol bullet, and of several who were badly beaten.

GOLD HILL, N. C., Sept. 23, 1865.

This morning I found the provost-marshal of the district in Concord collecting evidence relating to the riots, and preparing to make arrests. Captain Littler was aided in his investigations by Captain Freeman, of the 128th Indiana Vols., who had been for some years a detective officer in his native State—and I was amused to observe the zest with which he resumed the pursuits of his old profession; his keen enjoyment of the chase being tempered only by some natural regrets that he could not work up the thing in a citizen's dress, but was obliged to show himself in uniform. From these gentlemen I learned that the news of the fight, if it can be so called, was first taken to Salisbury by one of the county officers, who, several days previously, had been charged with the duty of laying before the military commander a petition of the magistrates of Cabarrus that a Federal garrison should be permanently maintained in the county. The provost-marshal had already obtained sufficient evidence to justify the arrest of some seven or eight citizens, and while I was with him he listened to the complaints of several men who desired the arrest of two or three other parties. Of one of these latter cases I took notes.

A young man, with one hand bandaged, came into the office, and said that if the captain was examining into the difficulty on election day, he had a charge to prefer against some niggers. He was requested to tell who they were, and gave the names of two, but that of another he did not know. "We got him into the jail, though," said he; "and he 's in thar now, I expect; and that 's the one I 'm most anxious about, for he 's the very man that hurt my thumb; and he 's the same man that demanded me to give up my pistol."

"Demanded your pistol, did he? What, to fight with? Let us hear the whole story."

"Yes, sir; I reckon he thought he 'd get it, and then he 'd make use of it

You see, I was n't out much that day. There was niggers everywhere, blockin' up all the stores, so a man could n't go in to buy anything, and fillin' the street up and down till the difficulty began. I reckon it was about four o'clock in the evenin', I was standin' in the squar', front o' the court-house, you know, and a man came up to me and says, 'Yonder goes a nigger, down by the depot, with rocks in his pocket; le 's go down and lick him.'"

"What was that man's name?"

"Well, he 's a man I do n't know. I know him by sight, but I do n't know as I ever spoke to the man till that day; but since then I 've heerd 'em say his name is Fur. Fur says, 'Yonder 's a nigger, and he 's got a pocket full of rocks; le 's go and take 'em away from him, and lick him.' 'All right,' I said; 'I 'm going down that way; come on.' We walked on to the depot. Sometimes we could see him, and then agin, when he went over a hill, we 'd lose sight; and it so happened we never did git to see him after he went over the next hill beyond the depot. But right thar, side o' the road, was these three niggers—Adam, and his son, and this nigger that 's in jail. 'Boys,' says I, 'what you doin' here?'—spoke jest in that manner. This nigger he made answer that they would n't let 'em stay in town, and they 'd run 'em out to that place. 'But never mind,' says he, 'the niggers 'll rule the day here yet, and you 'll see it in less 'n two months.' P'raps he mout ha' said twelve months, but I think it was two months he said. 'You d——n black son, etc.,' says I, 'what d' ye mean by that?' I expect he thought I was goin' to draw my pistol. I hed my hand in my pocket, but I did n't have my pistol in that pocket at all. The niggers began to pick rocks, and I believe Fur said, 'Shoot the black son, etc.' Fur was ahead o' me, and he did n't have any pistol. Then this nigger he says, 'Do n't you draw a pistol on me; do n't you draw a pistol. Give up that pistol,' demanding me to give up the pistol to him. The other niggers had begun to pitch for Fur, and he came back to me, and then the rocks flew pretty thick."

"Had Fur been throwing any rocks?"

"Well, Fur mout ha' throwed; expect Fur did throw some, but I could n't see all was done, for this nigger kept demandin' me to give up the pistol, and I was lookin' towards him. I snapped at him twice, but the pistol missed fire, and about that time they 'd run in on us with sticks, and this nigger hit me and knocked my thumb out o' place. Well, we had to retreat, and I reckon we fell back all o' thirty paces, and the niggers stood. I got my thumb back agin, and Fur and me went on towards 'em agin, and then the niggers fell back p'raps twenty steps. I do n't think it was twenty steps. We was goin' to arrest 'em, you see. But they commenced to throw rocks agin, and then I fired. I think I fired twice, but I missed him. I fired at this same nigger. By this time, some o' them up in the squar' see we was in a contention, and five or six went round a-horseback, and come in the rear o' the niggers, and then we arrested 'em."

"You arrested them, and handed them over to the sheriff?"

"Yes, sir. That is, we put 'em into the jail. I was in favor o' putting 'em thar. Some wanted to hang 'em. I might ha' killed that nigger very easy, but I'm a peaceable man. Some of 'em wanted to know why I did n't shoot 'em, but I said, 'No, put 'em in jail;' and when I heerd you 'd come to look into it, I thought I 'd come and make a complaint."

Capt. Littler appeared to think this man's course had not been so peaceable as it might have been, and, after hearing his complaint, ordered him to be taken into custody. Incidentally, his examination showed that the riot began at about eleven o'clock in the morning, and continued, with intermissions, till three o'clock in the afternoon. Several negroes were beaten severely, and for no better reason, so far as I could learn, than that they were "too sassy and stubborn," and, when the attack was made upon them, waited to be run out of the town, and in some cases even offered resistance, instead of running out of their own accord. Capt. Freeman afterwards informed me that the man who came so unsuspectingly to make the accusation had, before leaving the square, pre-arranged the rear attack of the mounted men whom he described as having so opportunely come to his assistance. This, I dare say, he himself would have admitted; he seemed to have no notion that any of his efforts to repress negro impudence had been marked by irregularity, and repeatedly expressed very great astonishment that "this nigger demanded me to give up my pistol."

I came to this village to-day, after seventeen miles' riding over the worst of rocky winding roads. "You see when they laid it out," said the landlord, "they did n't want to offend anybody by driving it right through his land, so they carried it round every farm between here and Concord." The village is the most poverty-stricken place in appearance that I have yet seen, with small, poor, unpainted houses, immense piles of slates, disused machinery under weather-beaten sheds, and shafts and mines filled with water, but the inhabitants, destitute of mails and news, give a ready welcome to the traveller, and he fares better than in better towns. They are now awaiting, I had almost said impatiently, but the ideas of Gold Hill and eagerness seem incongruous, the arrival of the president of the mining company from the North, whither he escaped after war had broken out, and who is expected on his return to recover the property from the possession of the Southern stockholders and recommence operations. The people profess to be Unionists, and I was told that many of them were perfectly satisfied with the results of the war, or would be so "when the Government hung Jeff., and made all the niggers settle in South Carolina. The name of South Carolina ought to be taken away, and it ought not to be called a State any more."

RANDOLPH Co., N. C., September 24, 1865.

To-day I have again been travelling through a country always poor and dry, and now drier than usual in consequence of the long drouth, which has seriously affected all the crops, and lowered the streams so much that many of the mills have ceased running. I have seen but a few houses, and only those of small farmers, and it was with difficulty that I found a lodging for the night. The farmer with whom I am staying says the people have so little to eat that they are ashamed to take in a stranger. He is a man of about fifty years of age, of average intelligence, and, like a majority of his neighbors, of his own free will would never have been a rebel, having no cause of complaint against the national Government or the Northern people, and, latterly, having learned to dislike the Confederate authorities for their exactions. He had owned five negroes, a woman with her four children, and expressed his acquiescence in their emancipation. The mother was anxious to stay with him, but he could afford to give her no wages, as the children were all small, and he wished to know if he was violating any law by taking her work for the family's board and clothing. I re-assured him upon this point, and he stated another perplexity under which he was laboring: a negro man, with a wife and several children, had left his employer because he could get no wages, no clothes, and not enough to eat, and had come to him begging with tears that he might be permitted to work on the farm. At first he had refused, for he had no money and only a little meat; but the man pleaded so hard, and it seemed so likely that the family would suffer, that he finally gave the desired permission. Since then he had been told several times that he was liable to be prosecuted for harboring another person's runaway servants, and would get into trouble if he persisted in keeping the family. His wife was frightened somewhat; he himself reckoned the black ones were free to go and come where they chose, but he would like me to give my opinion. I was able to quote some decisions of the neighboring Superintendents of Freedmen which covered this case also. He went on to say that many people of his acquaintance thought that the black ones would be re-enslaved, that they were not at present, and probably might never be, legally free. He had been compelled to serve in the home guard last winter, he said, and had been on duty at Salisbury; so, after supper, he lit a pipe and his wife another, and we sat before a light wood fire talking of the prison. The woman said her brother had been captured by the Yankees, and they treated him fine. She would have been glad to have fed her family on bread and water if them rebels would have let her carry what provisions she could spare to the poor prisoners. Certain sure they were dreadfully worsted, and a heap of people round Salisbury were grieved to see it, but they could do nothing to help them. If one of the guards threw in a piece of tobacco, and they caught him, he was tied up. The farmer's duty had compelled his attendance at the grave-yard on one or two occasions, and the recollection of what he saw there seemed to affect him much. His voice lowered as he told of the earth's being thrown in upon the naked bodies, and of one man thus buried whose face was still wet with the tears he had shed when dying. "I do n't say it to flatter you, mister, because you 're a Yankee, for I 've often said it to my wife before the surrender, and she 'll say so; but you would n't handle a mutton so careless as them poor men was handled in the carts and them ar trenches."

Not long after crossing the Yadkin, I fell in with an old man who almost insisted on my stopping to talk with him when he learned that I was from the North. He war n't a high larnt fellow, he said, none of 'em was round thar, but he was good Union, and it made him mighty glad to come across a man from the Northern States. "And you can't git hurt, stranger," he said, "not in this county, nor no other man that 's of a good Union principle. No you can't, stranger. I can tell you what we 's done with them ar secessioners that brought this thing on, and they a' n't a-goin to git the upper hands agin. One on 'em could n't git to oversee that ar dirt road you 's stan'in' on, not by vote, not in this county. Expect the road was mighty bad like, war n't it? We ha' n't worked 'em for a good while, but we 's goin' to turn to arter the corn 's got in, and I 'm thinkin' I 'll oversee it myself. We ha' n't no use for secessioners, not for nothin', and they begin to know it. Thar was one on 'em found that out this last week up yer at Jackson's Hill, for he was nigh about killed, and they would ha' killed him or beat him to death if he had n't got on to his mule and they was a-foot. Ye see in the war he was allus a mighty hunter for outlayers and sich, gittin' em into the army, and when he come to the 'lection one o' the boys, a namesake o' mine, see him, and says to him, 'R——, be ye done huntin' deserters?' I do n't know what answer he made, but L—— knocked him flat on his face. Then he got up and run, and the boys tuck arter him; but he ran past his mule, and as he run he got a holt o' the bridle and broke it, and made off as fast as ever he could. Oh, them ar hunters has got to keep quiet; they can 't bear the sway like they did. I told that same R—— how it would be. He was one of a parcel that was goin' to hang me one day about two years ago. Ye see, mister, I 'm a man I allus let my principle be known, and one day I come by the mill, and thar was R—— and his crowd, five or six on 'em, and they 'd been drinkin'. R—— he run into the mill and got a rope, and they tied it round my neck: they was for hangin' me right away. Says I, 'R——, ye mout as well make sure work o' this, for 'less ye do ye 'll pay fur it. Ye know me, William L——, and I tell ye ye 'll pay fur this some day if I git out o' your hands alive."

He asked many questions about the national debt, about Northern schools and railroads, about the wages of "hirelin's," the size of farms, the methods of cultivating corn and wheat, and especially about the feelings of the Northern people towards the rebellious States.

"I've heerd ye all reverence General Lee to be a great man. Ye do, do n't ye?"

I gave him the popular estimate of Lee's abilities.

"Yes, I 've heerd so; the Yankee soldiers with the wagon-train told me so. I tell our boys jest to look at that. 'Thar 's the Yankees,' I tell 'em, 'has give us a most etarnal lickin' as ever a parcel o' people did git, I reckon, and see how they hev compassion. Why, if our nasty secession heads had licked your people like they bragged, they 'd ha' been crowin',' I tell 'em, 'wuss 'n ever roosters. Yes,' I tell 'em, 'the Yankees is a marciful people, and willin' to make friendship with us.' "

PITTSBORO, N. C., September 26, 1865.

Yesterday and to-day I have ridden sixty miles over roads as bad and a country as lean and poor as those I found on Saturday and Sunday. The people in this county of Chatham are richer than their neighbors in Randolph, and there are more secessionists among them; but every man with whom I have talked in the course of the two days until I met my host of this evening, has avowed himself a Unionist; and both counties have sent up anti-secession delegates to the State Convention. My landlord says, however, that the result of this election is not a good criterion of the sentiment of the people; that the solid men of the State have not voted, and the convention will be the weakest body that ever assembled in North Carolina. The two classes seem to entertain and cherish feelings of bitter hostility towards each other, and I everywhere hear stories of assaults made upon persons who were formerly in the service of the Confederate government, and especially upon such as were engaged in picking up deserters. Quite generally these men discreetly absent themselves from election gatherings and other assemblages, and in many instances where they have appeared as voters or as candidates have been forced to fly for their lives. Since leaving Salisbury, I believe I have been in no county where such disturbances were not spoken of as having recently occurred, and offences against property are perhaps more numerous. My landlord tells me that his mother has been obliged to leave her home in Randolph County by a mob who threatened to destroy the house if she stayed in it; and he mentioned several houses, which he said I must have seen as I passed along the road, which are standing empty for similar reasons. I readily believed him, for a man in Ashboro, who was a county magistrate and also an officer of the police, told me that he could count more than a hundred houses owned by secessionists which had been broken into and robbed within the past few months. "Them outlayin' boys had learned a little bushwhackin'," he said, "when the secessioners learn'd 'em to live in the woods." The anti-secession men seem to be having everything their own way at present, in this part of the State at any rate. "Wait two years," my landlord says, "and then you 'll see." He openly says, "We 've got to get back into the Union, and we 'll have to do many things repugnant to our feelings, but we must first of all get back and get our own State into our own hands."

This afternoon I had an amusing interview with a woman whom I found gathering sticks and rotten wood by the roadside. A little girl was with her, and both seemed the poorest of whites, dirty and wretched to the last degree, but yet not so sunk in sulkiness and apathy as most of their class, for the woman talked almost incessantly and laughed a great deal. I asked my way to Pittsboro, and, looking hard at me all the time, she gave me some bewildering directions about the roads to be crossed and the forks to be left on the right hand and the left, and at the end she said:

"Mister, whar be ye frum?"

"I'm from the North."

"The North!" she said, dropping the armful of sticks and coming nearer to me. "Be you a —— one o' them —— what they call Yankees? Do n't be offended, gentleman, that 's what they calls 'em; be you a Yankee?"

"I suppose I must be."

"Excuse me, gentleman, but I must look at you, fur I heerd so much about the Yankees and I niver seed one yit. Lord! Lord! A ra'al Yankee! Maria, he looks most like our folks, do n't he? He sartin do. Lord, and him to be one on 'em! Well, I must praise the Yankees if they looks like you. Maria, do n't they look right nice?"

This compliment she soon afterwards completely spoiled. She went on:

"I see you come ridin' along, and I says to my gal Maria, yer's your cousin comin', I do believe. Do n't he look like John, Maria? Indeed you do, gentleman, you r'e built like him and you 're like him in the face. John, he 's my sister Bet's son. I wish Bet could see you, and daddy, he 'd be proud to see you."

She urged me to ride down a mile from the road and visit her daddy, who was eighty-two years old, and would be very much pleased to see a Yankee, but I was obliged to refuse, for I had still more than twelve miles to ride before reaching Pittsboro, and the afternoon was wearing away. She did n't know what would become of her and her children, now the black ones was free. She said: "We poor folks was about ekil to the niggers, about bein' hard put to it to live, I mean, and now they 's free they do n't do nothin' but steal, and how we 'll live I do n't know. They say it 's the Yankees rules everything now, and I wish you 'd tell me how poor folks is to live among these niggers. I never was married, and daddy 's eighty-two years old, and me and my children 's afraid to go out when we hear 'em in the corn-field." It would have been useless, I suppose, to counsel her to cleanliness or industry or decency of manners and morals, and I had to decline the difficult post of her adviser.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, September 23, 1865.

TO-DAY the first public examination of the Fenian prisoners is to take place in Dublin; and then, I suppose, we shall know at least something about the matter. It is said, however, that when the case comes on, the counsel for the Crown will ask for a further adjournment, in order to complete their case; and I think the report will probably prove true. If I were writing a sensation letter to you, after the style in which the late lamented, though not respected, "Manhattan" of the Standard was a proficient, I might make a good deal out of what the Irish newspapers, with their usual love of exaggeration, call the Dublin "coup d'état." But, if I am to tell you the honest truth, this Fenian outbreak has excited almost no attention in England, less even than I think it deserves—and that is saying a good deal. As yet, Englishmen cannot take the matter seriously. There is something so absolutely ludicrous, according to our feelings, in a score or two of retired policemen, local penny-a-liners, and mechanics out of work, like the prisoners who have been arrested in Ireland, conspiring to upset the Government of the United Kingdom, that our chief feeling is one of irritation at the importance these busybodies will attain from the notoriety of a state prosecution. It would take so many years of successful revolt, so many disastrous campaigns, before Englishmen could even realize the possibility of the union being dissolved by force, that I attach comparatively little value to our utter indifference to the movement as an evidence of its insignificance. Whether right or wrong, we could scarcely have received the news of an insurrection in Thibet or Timbuctoo with more absolute unconcern. Our papers have written but little on the subject, and as yet not a single journal of importance has thought it worth while to send a special correspondent to the scene of—what shall I say?—agitation. Even in Ireland itself the Fenian movement appears to have created singularly little excitement. Somehow or other it did not appeal to the popular Irish instinct, as similar movements have done in bygone years. Whether this was because the nation is more contented with our rule, or because the tide of emigration has depleted the strength of the country, or because the priests refused to sanction the enterprise, the fact is certain that the Fenian leaders have not met with the support accorded even to Mitchell and Meagher and Smith O'Brien in the days of the cabbage-garden conspiracy. The Celtic race, in my opinion, belong to that department of the army of humanity which I once heard a poor woman describe her husband as belonging to, namely, "God's own unaccountables;" and, therefore, I am not sanguine enough to assume that Fenianism may not have deep ramifications amongst the Irish peasantry, because they act exactly as if they cared nothing about the matter. They do not act, however, as if they felt any sympathy for the Fenian prisoners, and, indeed, evince great willingness to give them up to justice. This fact alone seems to me almost conclusive. Swift, who said more cruel things about his countrymen than any hundred Anglo-Saxon writers, declared that whenever an Irishman was to be roasted alive, there would always be found another Irishmen ready to turn the spit; and the want of loyalty of Celts towards each other has been a favorite theme of satire ever since. But I believe the experience of our Irish police would not confirm this theory. In all cases of agrarian murder, where a landlord has fallen a victim in consequence of some sin against the unwritten popular code, it is found impossible to obtain evidence. Hundreds of poor peasants know the name and whereabouts of the murderer. But no threat or bribe will induce them to give him up to justice. Thus, if the Fenian movement was, in truth, a popular one, I do not believe the police would find any assistance from the native Irish in detecting the conspirators. It is, however, notorious that every meeting, movement, and project of the Fenians has been regularly reported to the authorities at the Castle by amateur spies. As far as can be discovered, no single person of position or even respectability has mixed himself up with the plot; and it is commonly asserted that a great number of the alleged Fenian demonstrations have been got up by zealous Orange partizans who desired to frighten the Government into action.

If this view is correct, you will probably ask how it is the Ministry have thought it advisable to adopt such energetic measures of repression, and have even gone to the length of arresting supposed conspirators in Liverpool and Manchester? All I can tell you positively is that we are all asking the same question ourselves, without being able to give any satisfactory answer to it. When Parliament meets, the conduct of the Government will be doubtless severely criticized by the opposition; and Mr. Disraeli will find full exercise for his sarcastic powers in describing how the Premier was frightened out of his propriety by a plot between a pedlar and a policeman. I suspect the Ministry will find it difficult to make a good case, chiefly because they will not feel at liberty to explain their real motives. If the whole truth could be told—which it certainly will not—it would, I think, be found that the true motive for this decided and prompt action lay in communications received from America. It is supposed that intimations were forwarded to the following effect: if the Fenians should succeed in organizing anything resembling an insurrection—no matter how contemptible in itself—the Irish in the States would aid them by subscriptions, by the dispatch of arms, possibly of recruits. In the present excited state of American feeling toward England, it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the United States Government to put a stop to such demonstrations; and, therefore, any outbreak of insurrection, unimportant as it might be in itself, would most probably lead to grave complications between England and America. How far this view is a correct one, you are in a far better position to judge than I can be; but I have reason to suspect it has been laid before our Government and has influenced their action. We may possibly be the victims of a bugbear. Conscience, as we all know, "doth make cowards of us all;" and I think most candid Englishmen have an uncomfortable conviction in their own hearts that the precedents we established during the civil war in the West might be turned against ourselves with fatal retaliation. On such a subject as this, an honest man ought to speak the truth; and therefore I tell you cordially, that in the utterly improbable event of a real insurrection, any aid to the insurgents of the kind which, I own with deep regret, was furnished by Englishmen to the Confederates, would involve immediate war. Your Government might frame its despatches in the "ipsissima verba" of Earl Russell's lucubrations, and show that it was not, and could not, be responsible for the acts of individual citizens. But no Ministry could stand against the popular outcry for war which would rage here, in case an American Alabama were to sail under an Irish flag. I think most Americans will confess that the reason why war between our two countries was happily avoided during the late struggle, was not because you were convinced of the justice of our representations, but because you had too much upon your hands at home to undertake a foreign war. Of course, if the suppression of an Irish rebellion tested our energies to the utmost, we should, like wise men, put up with what we could not help. But it is to me utterly inconceivable that under any circumstances Ireland could get up an insurrection which England could not suppress in a month.

I have dwelt on this Fenian matter more at length than I should otherwise, out of an impression that its importance may be exaggerated across the Atlantic. As a simple chronicler of subjects of passing interest in England, I should dismiss it with a couple of lines. The apprehension that it might possibly cause trouble with America has not been as yet realized by the public, and apart from this danger it is utterly insignificant. No doubt it has one aspect of a more lasting interest, and that is the want of sympathy for our rule in Ireland manifested by the very fact of its existence. We have had possession of the sister kingdom for centuries, and for the last thirty years and more—in fact, ever since the passage of the Catholic Emancipation bill—we have given her the same rights, privileges, and freedom as we enjoy ourselves. And yet, the awkward truth remains incontrovertible that we have not made her prosperous, or contented, or loyal. Hitherto, we have believed that her disaffection was due solely to the evil effects of unjust legislation in years gone by. But gradually we are beginning to doubt whether the root of disaffection does not lie deeper still, in an innate divergence between the Celtic and Saxon natures. As I mentioned to you in a former letter, many of our most thoughtful statesmen are inclined to believe that Ireland ought to be legislated for on principles distinct from those which govern our administration of England. And the circumstance that a rebellion should be deemed possible in Ireland at the present day will assuredly strengthen this conviction, which Mr. Gladstone, amongst others, is said to entertain strongly. There are already indications that the status of the Established Church in Ireland will be brought under discussion next session. Threatened men live long; and the Irish Establishment has survived so many attacks that it would be dangerous to prophesy its early decease. It is, however, symptomatic that the Times and the Saturday Review, both, in the true sense of the word, Conservative organs, have of late been assailing the expediency of maintaining a national church which does not comprise one-eighth of the population.

At last we have had a quasi revival of political life. The other day a demonstration in favor of an extension of the franchise took place at Glasgow, at which Mr. Bright was asked to be present. The member for Birmingham declined to accept the invitation on two grounds; the first was, that if he went to one meeting he must go to others, and that his health was not in a state to allow him to undertake a political agitation; the second and more important was, that so long as Lord Palmerston lived, he thought it inadvisable to commence an agitation for reform. The second reason I believe to be the real one. Mr. Bright suffers very much from a sort of bronchial affection, and, unless I am much mistaken in my judgment, no consideration of personal inconvenience would induce him to spare himself if he could forward the cause he has so much at heart. As a matter of prudence, I believe Mr. Bright acts wisely in suspending the idea of reform so long as Lord Palmerston lives or holds the confidence of the public. But when he lays the blame of the failure of the previous reform agitation at the door of the Premier, as "the only man connected with the Liberal party able and willing to betray it," I think he puts the saddle on the wrong horse. The minister, to do him justice, never seemed to feel any enthusiasm in the cause of reform; he declared his readiness to pass a reform bill if the country required it; but that was all. The agitation broke down because the country manifested no eagerness to have the suffrage extended, not because the Premier, or the Ministry, or the Parliament was averse to change. This is the truth; and, like all truths, pleasant or unpleasant, it had better be recognized. As I have before told you, Lord Palmerston is the minister of a transition era; and even if he was not verging on extreme old age, he would never be retained in office if ever the country took up reform in earnest. His presence in the premiership is a proof that, for the time, the nation is not ripe for change; and therefore sincere reformers are perhaps well advised in not undertaking a hopeless enterprise. No doubt, the personal popularity of Lord Palmerston tends to prolong the public apathy on the subject of reform; but this apathy is the cause rather than the result of his official reign. Meanwhile, in political circles, the rumor that he will not be able to meet Parliament next session is again recovering strength. I know that his friends are much disappointed at the comparatively little progress he has made in regaining his normal vigor during the recess. Last year he was constantly before the public throughout the whole of the holidays; this year, he has scarcely appeared in public since the elections. Lord Derby, too, is much out of health, and it seems as if before long new men, and with them new ideas, will come to the front in English politics. I am sure that both are needed.

I have, let me say here, received a copy of THE NATION, with some comments you were kind enough to make on what you termed my plea for Jefferson Davis. I am afraid that, as your correspondent, I did not make my meaning sufficiently clear to you. Personally, I can assure you that I, and many English friends of America who, I know, think with me, have as little respect or esteem of any kind for the ex-President as you can have. Our wish that his life may be spared is due to no regard for him, but to our respect for the American nation. All history teaches us that the execution of the leaders of an unsuccessful rebellion has been ultimately regretted by the nation or dynasty which inflicted the penalty, and we suspect the lessons of history are equally true on one side of the Atlantic as the other. If, as you urge, the crime of secession is an utterly exceptional one, then I should reply that your position as a nation is also an exceptional one, and that therefore you are able—and, if able, obliged—to act by a higher standard than our Old World one. However, the question is one which you happily have both the power and the right to decide for yourselves. My only object in again alluding to it is to make my own position clear.

THE EUROPEAN AND AMERICAN ORDER OF THOUGHT.

INTELLECTUAL timidity is the infirmity of cultivated men. Property is essentially conservative, and as a general rule, therefore, they who claim a present distinction are willingly sceptical and indifferent to the promise of the future. Such is human nature, and nobody is to blame for it short of the original Adam. A bird in the hand, says the proverbial wisdom of the world, is worth two in the bush. Sure present possession outweighs any amount of contingent future acquisition. You would not expect a physician in good practice to be foremost in denouncing his own therapeutics, and advocating a better. You would not expect a successful lawyer whose fame and revenues are dependent on the existing methods of his profession to be over-zealous for the reform of those methods. Neither would you expect a clergyman of conspicuous standing in his church to take the lead there in inaugurating a dogmatic or ritual revolution. Any particular lawyer, doctor, or divine might, it is true, disconcert your expectation; but the expectation is nevertheless perfectly reasonable, because it is based upon general experience, or deduced from the principles which regulate human nature itself, and which must, therefore, justify themselves in the long run. The past, in so far as it overlaps the present, does so in purely fossil form, and hence resists decay. And the present, in so far as it has got itself formulated in institutions, or identified with living interests, fights tooth and nail against the future. In a word, conflict is the law of progress; and a very benignant law it is, no doubt, since we seem incapable of greatly estimating any blessing which is lightly won. We have no complaint to make of the fact. We only adduce it by way of hinting a probable explanation of the serious misconception into which European, and especially English, conservatism has been betrayed in respect to American character and tendencies.

What makes the peculiarity of the era in which we live is, that it is the consummation of a long conflict between two civilizations—one artificial and provisional, as built on force; the other natural and final, as built on freedom, or the spontaneous tendencies of the mind; one, consequently, moribund, as referring its true vigor to the past; the other nascent, as finding its sure promise in the future. The political life of Europe universally, and that of England in an eminent degree, amounts only to a temporary compromise or truce, not to a permanent reconciliation, of this great warfare. European, and especially English, culture aims to endow man with civil freedom or citizenship, and contemplates no higher destiny as within the range of his earthly possibilities. The European theory of human life is that it is primarily civil and only derivatively social, so that the persons who are identified with the civil administration have a legitimate title also to an exceptional social position; and its ideal of individual manhood is that it is moral, not æsthetic—voluntary, not spontaneous. Now, the American idea, on both these points, is strikingly opposed to the European one. You have only to observe the popular instincts, as reflected in the general tenor of our legislation, to perceive very plainly that our theory of human life is that it is primarily social and only derivatively civil; and hence makes delight rather than duty, spontaneity rather than will, the law of our individual development. It is this fundamental yet wholly involuntary divergence on our part from the traditions of the Old World which exposes us to European, and especially English, obloquy and intolerance. It is not evolution they see in us, for that they could easily reconcile themselves to; it is revolution, and revolution in the most inward and conventionally sacred realm of life. Practically, in fact, our institutions are an exact inversion of theirs, what is first and last in our estimation being severally last and first in theirs, so that their judgments of us necessarily undergo the same dislocation with respect to the actual facts of the case that our view of the landscape undergoes when we look at it through an inverted telescope. Their contempt of us is not voluntary or conscious; it is wholly instinctual and unconscious, growing out of a sheer diversity of natural temperament or providential direction between us, and arguing no wilful perverseness on their part. It is the difference between the conventionally righteous and the conventionally reprobate man of the gospels, the former of whom cannot help saying, with all his heart, "Lord, I thank thee that I am not as this publican," etc. And it would be just as unreasonable in us to demand a favorable European or English judgment of us as it would be to ask a New York millionaire to renounce his wealth and trot about the streets in the insignia of a voluntary or ostentatious poverty.

We emphasize the Englishman in all this matter, because there is no bosom extant in which the social principle, the principle of a wholly spontaneous equity among men, is so weak as in the English, and the civic or moral principle, the principle of voluntary or legal rectitude, so strong There is no one, consequently, so eminently disqualified as the Englishman is by original genius (and, indeed, acquired culture also) to do us justice, in whose development the social sentiment grows ever more absolute, and the moral sentiment ever more impotent. It is this supremacy of will to spontaneity, of moral to æsthetic force, of civic to social aspiration, of outward letter, in short, to inward spirit, which constitutes the strength of European conservatism, and which renders the Englishman specifically so unsocial, or averse to all change which looks towards the eventual brotherhood or fellowship of man. Our political and ecclesiastical heritage cannot help striking him as painfully squalid, because it disavows all sanctity underived from the popular heart. The supremacy of the distinctively social conscience among us both to the civic and ecclesiastic conscience, makes him pat his own old paunch of privilege with infinite complacency, and ensures us his boundless reprobation. Every look at us is sure to inflame his helpless arrogance, and harden him inwardly against those tides of fellowship or equality which are here flowing unchecked—at all events by institutions—into the human mind, and so preparing, let us hope, an immaculate divine edifice in human nature. In short, belief in England and in the permanence of English institutions and culture is a religious obligation upon the average Englishman's conscience; and his contempt of you accordingly is not wilful or flippant, but is a slow, dumpy, adipose product of his defective spiritual respiration, of his still immature manhood. It is an honest excrescence of natural genius or temperament in him—astonishing you, no doubt, by its magnitude, benumbing you for the most part by its contact, reducing you to impotence before it; but you respect it in its place, just as you respect a goitre in Switzerland or a blue-nose in Nova Scotia, and never dream of making the unaffected individual subject of it responsible.

There is, however, a spurious Englishman—a cheap modern edition of this ancient stately original—the Scotch, Canadian, or West Indian Englishman, who is full, oftentimes, of wilful impertinence, and fidgets you like fleas, poisoning your honest human flesh by his venomous intention past all scratching to relieve, and making you long to get well hold of him once between finger and thumb, in order to do the wholesome world a service. These parasitic English stand in the same unhandsome relation to the true John Bull as the retainers of a great house stand in towards its lord. The heir of the house is incapable of parading his dignity, but all they who wear his livery either under or above their clothes—namely, his poor relations and his paid servants—turn up their futile, consequential noses in a manner so aggressive and violent as greatly to invite pulling on the part of the embarrassed head of the family, and dispose him oftentimes to renounce a conventional dignity so fatal to all who underpin it or even believe in it. There can be no doubt that this provincial and colonial flunkeyism provokes the same disgust in the manly English bosom that it does in ours. However limited the Englishman may be in point of social sympathy, he has none of this fretful, mischievous, suspicious consciousness which you observe in the Canadian, Scotch, or other poor relation. And we must say we seldom meet in a respectable English periodical the same shameless rage of insult and defamation which is habitual to the Scotch "Blackwood." The editorial temper of this snuffy, unventilated magazine, both moral and intellectual, is morbid enough to be the effect of a repelled eruption—looks like a cuticular irritation driven in to prey at leisure upon heart and brain. It is the temper of a vixenish old family nurse, with arms always akimbo, who feels so sure of her darling provoking everybody's distrust or dislike as to be for ever railing at the rest of the parish by anticipation on his behalf. And we apprehend that you may always, when you encounter anything very dirty or unscrupulous in English periodicals, safely ascribe it, not to any Englishman who is socially enfranchised, or entitled to the dignity of a man in his own country, but to some underbred member of that large herd who live by the pecuniary patronage or the social tolerance of the aristocracy.

We have been indulging in no personal comparisons between the European and the American, to the latter's advantage. Our purpose has been simply to contrast the spirit which animates European institutions with that which animates ours; and to show that while the one contemplates and provides for the highest individual distinction among men, at the risk if not at the actual cost of a permanent debasement of all the rest, the other provides for and tolerates no such distinction which does not grow out of the gradual elevation of the masses. We have no doubt that so far as the personal attitude of the European and the American is concerned, with reference to the reigning temper of their respective institutions, the advantage is very apt to be with the European; for he is oftentimes individually very much in advance of his institutions, while the American is almost never quite up to his. A European, and especially an English, democrat is now the foremost style of man; while an American aristocrat is really or spiritually no man at all, but a wretched ape who disguises his inward inhumanity under a patchwork of outward or moral fair-seeming, and so secures the privilege of chattering and biting at discretion. But you may know him by one infallible token: he is for ever hunting up vermin on the body of his kind.

A BUNDLE OF OLD LETTERS.

THE subjoined letters, written by distinguished men of a former generation, are submitted to the public by the writer of the article printed in this journal entitled "A Connecticut Village." They were selected from a large mass of interesting correspondence which can only be published in full when the life has been written of the very able and eminent man to whom they were addressed. The first is from Benjamin Franklin, and exhibits him as a printer and interested in a scheme for the education and improvement of his fellow-men:

PHILADA., July 2, 1752.

REVD. SIR: I have sent you via New York twenty-four of your books, bound as those I sent you by post. The remainder of the fifty are binding in a plainer manner, and shall be sent as soon as done, and left at Mr. Stuvesant's as you order.

Our academy, which you so kindly enquire after, goes on well. Since Mr. Martin's death the Latin and Greek school has been under the care of Mr. Allison, a Dissenting minister, well skilled in those languages, and long practiced in teaching; but he refused the rectorship, or to have anything to do with the government of the other schools. So that remains vacant, and obliges the trustees to more frequent visits. We have now several young gentlemen desirous of entering on the study of philosophy, and lectures are to be opened this week. Mr. Allison undertakes logic and ethics, making your work his text, to comment and lecture upon. Mr. Peters and some other gentlemen undertake the other branches till we shall be provided with a rector capable of the whole, who may attend wholly to the instruction of youth in those higher parts of learning, as they come out fitted from the lower schools.

Our proprietors have lately wrote that they are extremely well pleased with the design, will take our seminary under their patronage, give us a charter, and, as an earnest of their benevolence, five hundred pounds sterling. And by our opening a charity school, in which over one hundred poor children are taught reading, writing, and arithmetick, with the rudiments of religion, we have gained the general good-will of all sorts of people, from whence donations and bequests may be reasonably expected to accrue from time to time. This is our present situation, and we think it a promising one, especially as the reputation of our schools increases, the masters being all very capable and diligent, and giving great satisfaction to all concerned.

I have heard of no exceptions yet made to your work, nor do I expect any, unless to those parts that savor of what is called Berkleyanism, which is not well understood here. When any occur I shall communicate them.

With great esteem and respect,
I am, D'r Sir,
Your obliged humble servant,
B. FRANKLIN.

The next letter will be read with interest by the lovers of astronomy, and gives us a most agreeable impression of the character of one of the fathers of New York, Cadwallader Colden:

COLDENSHAM, March 20, 1753.

SIR: Some time in the winter I sent you a small treatise, which I published in England, in hopes of obtaining your remarks, with that freedom which ought always to subsist in philosophical enquiries, on some parts of it which fall within the sphere of your speculations. I still hope to receive them when your leisure will permit.

The design of the present letter is, by your assistance, to excite some of the gentlemen at New Haven to observe the transit of Mercury on the sun, which will happen the 6th of May next. Mr. Franklin has published directions from the French Academy for observing it, which, I make no doubt, he has sent to you and to some gentlemen in New Haven. I think it needless therefore to trouble you with anything on that head, except it be to observe to you, that as the observing the time accurately is the principal thing to be taken care of in this observation, that I think this can be done with the greatest certainty by observing the sun's passing a meridian line, and thereby correcting your clock, for some days before the transit, and the day after, or as soon after as can be done. This is accurately done by observing the time when the sun's proceeding limb touches the meridian, and at what time by the clock the subsequent limb touches the needle between the two in the exact time of noon apparent time. If your radius be large enough, it may be determined to a second of time. If you have a good Sesson's theodolite, the meridian may be found by it to one minute, which does not produce an error of above four seconds in time. Or the meridian may be found perhaps more accurately by Mr. Derham's method, in the abridgment of the Philos. Transactions, vol. 4, page 465. The methods of finding apparent time by the altitude of the sun or stars are subject to more errors, as more data are requisite, viz., the latitude of the place, and declination of the sun or stars, and an error may slip in the calculations, which are not necessary in case a meridian line be used for finding the time. The inner contact of Mercury with the sun's limb may, with a good telescope, be observed to the trembling of the eye, and as it is hoped that this instantaneous phenomenon may be observed at Boston, New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, and other parts of North America, we may expect that the longitude with respect to each other will be determined to great accuracy, which otherwise we may not have an opportunity of doing by actual observation in many years. This may be of particular advantage to us, besides the general advantage proposed by the astronomers in Europe of determining the distance of the earth from the sun, by making this observation at places far distant from each other on the globe. If any further directions be desired, I shall very cheerfully give my assistance so far as I am capable. You will oblige me exceedingly if by your means I can have any observation made, communicated to me, together with the methods taken in observing and of determining the time.

Please, sir, to remember me affectionately to my grandchildren. Tell them I hope they will not neglect the opportunity they now have for instruction, and of imbibing maxims for the conduct of life which they 'll find of the greatest use as long as they live, in whatever sphere Providence may place them in this world. If they neglect the advantages they have with you, they may repent when it is too late. It gives me the greatest pleasure to see what advances their sisters make in every kind of improvement proper for women. They not only excel others of their age in needle-work, but in reading and writing. They not only spell better than women at any age commonly do, but form their sentences and join their words with a propriety that really surprises me. If they had more assistance, I make no doubt of their being distinguished by their proficiency in the Belles Lettres.

I am with great esteem,
Sir, your most Humble and obedient servant,
CADWALLADER COLDEN.

REV. DR. JOHNSON.

The following letter was written a month after the birth of Harrison Gray Otis, who was the nephew of James Otis; and though brief, we can discern the fire in the nature of that great lawyer, who always desired to die by a stroke of lightning, and did die in that manner:

BOSTON, Novr. 12, 1765.

DR. SIR: I rec'd yours and am very glad to find your assembly so far approving of the measures taken at ye Congress. I could have wished they had sent an agent from among them. I had ye pleasure, as I came through the colony, to hear you named as a candidate. The assembly here have done us ye honor fully to approve of our proceedings, and have voted ye thanks of the House to their committee. There was a motion to except ye Brigadr., our Notable President, but as he was absent I apologized for his strange conduct as well as I could, and the proposed determination subsided. The people of this province, however, will never forgive him.

We are much surprised at the violent proceedings at New York, as there has been so much time for people to cool, and the outrages on private property are so generally detected. By a vessel from So. Carolina we learn that the people were in a tumult at Charlestown, and terrible consequences apprehended. God knows what all these things will end in, and to him they must be submitted. In the meantime 't is much to be feared the Parliament will charge ye colonies with presenting petitions in one hand and a dagger in the other. Pray for ye peace of Jerusalem, as I do for your prosperity, and am much your friend and humble servant, J. OTIS.

WILLIAM SAML. JOHNSON, Esq., at Stratford.

The style and sentiments contained in the next letter, by Edward Rutledge, suggest many a sad contrast:

DEAR SIR: When Mr. Izard was on the eve of embarking for New York, I took the liberty of requesting him to make some arrangement for the education of my son; and tho' I have not the pleasure of your acquaintance, yet the very excellent reputation which you sustain among all descriptions of men, and more particularly among those in whose judgment I am accustomed to repose myself, led my mind to fix itself on you as a gentleman extremely fit in all respects to undertake that charge. When I suggested to my friends that I thought you would consider me as making too bold a request, they told me I was a stranger to your character, for that you delighted in acts of benevolence; and so you certainly must, sir, if you consent to take my son under your immediate protection, a youth in a strange country, and point out to him the road to happiness thro' the paths of virtue and wisdom.

In all governments whatever, I consider it an indispensable duty in parents to attend to the education of their children; but it becomes, if possible, more particularly so in republics, whose existence depends on the integrity of its citizens, and whose citizens are equally entitled, from the very nature of their government, to a participation in all the offices of the state. Accustomed, as I have been from my earliest manhood, to take a share in the public councils of my country, I soon became impressed with the necessity of an enlarged education, and I think I afford no very slender proof of my conviction when I consent to part with my only son at his perilous age. But I am reconciled to the measure when I consider to whose care I am committing him, and that I am discharging the obligations which I owe to him and to the community. I shall not presume to point out to you the plan of his education. The great objects I have in view are to make him a good man and a valuable citizen; and to say this much, I am sure, is sufficient. I shall only add that as my family are small, and my fortune easy, I feel no repugnance at any expense which may be occasioned by his education, and that I will cheerfully and punctually discharge every pecuniary engagement which he may incur. Those other obligations which can never be discharged, but which I trust will be lightened by his gratitude and mine. I have the honor to be, Dear Sir,

With much esteem and respect,
Yr. very oblig'd and humble servant,
EDWARD RUTLEDGE.

CHARLESTON, May 21, 1777.

DR. WILLIAM S. JOHNSON, New York.

Our next letter was written by Ralph Izard, of whom Washington once said, "No man was more honest in public life." His allusion to the two objects nearest his heart is truly noble.

CHARLESTON, 20th December, 1787.

DEAR SIR: It gives me much pleasure to hear that you have accepted of the Presidency of Columbia College, not only because I think the public in general will be much benefited by it, but I have also a private self-interested satisfaction on account of my sons being placed under your care. The calamities of the late war were extended with uncommon violence to this State. I have had my full share of them, and time has not yet entirely reconciled me to them. There are two objects very near my heart, which, if I live to see accomplished, will be an ample compensation for everything that I have suffered. I wish to see a good solid federal government established, and my sons so educated as to afford me a prospect of their being men of abilities and honor, and of their becoming useful, valuable citizens of their country. To the first of these you have contributed in the Convention; and to the latter I firmly believe you will also contribute. I have a good opinion of the capacity of my son Henry, and it will make me very happy to hear from you that his manners, conduct, and attention to his studies meet with your approbation. It is my wish that he should be a lawyer. If he arrives at eminence in his profession, it will be the certain means of his being placed in the most eligible situation in this country. He should not only be a good classical scholar, but also a good mathematician, which I think a very necessary foundation for the profession of the law. Many of the causes in our courts are occasioned by intricate questions respecting the lines and boundaries of landed estates, for which reason he will derive great advantage from being a good surveyor. My son informs me that the mornings are employed in college, and that the students are allowed to dispose of their time as they please in the evenings. This, in my opinion, is placing them in a very critical situation, as the evening hours of a young man, when left entirely to his own discretion, are not those which are most likely to be spent to the greatest advantage. I lament the necessity of my son's being absent from my family more on that account than any other, as he may be frequently at a loss how to dispose properly of that part of his time. It is, therefore, to this point that I shall take the liberty of an old friend in requesting your particular attention; and I hope it will not be thought too troublesome or inconvenient for you to admit him as part of your own family. This will give me the satisfaction of knowing that he has an asylum against the inconveniences which I have just mentioned. You will be good enough to write me fully on everything that relates to him. He has, in common with all young men, and indeed all mankind, his merits and demerits, and it is proper that I should be acquainted with both. My wife offers her compliments, and I am with great regard, Dear Sir,

Your most obt. servant,
DR. JOHNSON. RALPH IZARD.

The writer of the next letter, Richard Stockton, was the only man, we believe, ever succeeded in the United States Senate by a son and a grandson, of which one of the present Senators from New Jersey may well be proud:

MORVEN, Feby. 18, 1813.

DEAR SIR: I must ask your forgiveness, withal I have omitted writing you so long since the receipt of yours of the 13th November last. It would have been answered by the gentleman whe delivered it to me, but I was obliged the next day to set out on a journey into the province of New York, and having missed that opportunity, other business immediately necessary to be done has prevented me, like other sinners, from doing the duties of to-day, because I intended them to-morrow.

I shall pay particular attention to the case of your friend Mr. Lowther; yet nothing, I suppose, can be done till the meeting of the Council of Proprietors of East Jersey (some time in April next). As soon as I have anything worthy of communicating I shall write you on the subject, so as to enable you to state the matter to Mr. Lowther.

I congratulate you, or rather the colony of Connecticut, on your appointment to a seat on the bench of your Supreme Court, which I was informed of by the gentleman who brought me your last letter. It is not ordinarily so profitable in this country as the crawling Barr, but is more dignified; and it has the advantage of an argument much more weighty with you than either of these—the doing good.

If ever you should pass through this province, I shall hope for the pleasure of taking you by the hand at Morven, but if not, I shall always be with much esteem and respect, Dear Sir,

Your most obedient and very humble servant,
RICHARD STOCKTON.

THE HON. MR. JOHNSON.

The last two letters which we submit are from Jared Ingersoll, and afford us a very interesting view of London a hundred years ago:

LONDON, April 17, 1759.

WM. S. JOHNSON, ESQR.:

SIR: It is now about three months since my arrival at this place. At my first coming there was such a confusion of objects crowding on me all at once, that, while I saw everything, I saw nothing—as the proverb has it, "I could not see the trees for the woods." London is truly a small world of itself, and is continually increasing at a very good rate. I am told that the additional buildings erected within these three years almost equal any city in the kingdom, beside Bristol and two or three more. The monuments of labor and skill are prodigious, and yet, let me tell you, there is a certain gloominess and dirtiness, if I may be allowed the expression, that hangs upon the whole, which renders the view less brilliant and agreeable than that of piles of building in America. There are very few houses on which you can discover any difference between the brick and the painting of time; all is one dull brown, occasioned by that perpetual cloud of smoke arising from the immense quantity of sea-coal that is burnt in the city; and no doubt much must be attributed to what is vulgarly called the thickness and heaviness of the air. The climate is vastly moist; the vapors, therefore, and smoke, with which the air is charged, do not buoy up as in a more elastick atmosphere. This same moistness, however, makes a rich soil—'tis now good mowing in the fields about London. I know the winter has been remarkably mild; there has been nothing like snow or frost since my being here; yet I must think the soil, in general, of this old England is very rich. What a delightful country did I pass through for three hundred miles together after landing at Falmouth—all green as May; the full blade and leaf of the spire and clover grass teeming with vigorous life; the herds and flocks feeding, and the husbandmen plowing; no waste grounds, unless here and there a heath, and even that feeding thousands of young cattle and sheep—all cultivated in the neatest manner—no sunken swamps—no rocky, stony places—the hill and the vale equally covered with a rich profusion of nature's bounty—no woods to break the prospect, only where planted here and there compact together; but no more of earth.

You will naturally suppose that I have improved some of my leisure hours in looking into the several courts. 'T was term time when I came, accordingly I attended some little at the King's Bench, some at Chancery, at the Common Pleas, and at the sittings at Guildhall; have also been in the House of Commons, and have heard argued several causes on appeal before the House of Lords, and some at the Cockpit before the Council, etc. The late Lord Chancellor Hardwick, the present Lord Chief-Justice Mansfield, and the Lord Keeper Henly, seem to be very much the triumvirate who decide all matters of weight at whatever board. If a committee of the Privy Council be appointed to hear any cause bro't by appeal before the King and Council, Hardwick and Mansfield are sure to be two of 'em, and to have no inconsiderable hand in the determination. In the House of Lords the Lord Keeper brings in no cause of appeal till Hardwick and Mansfield come, and truly the best of the House seem to take but little notice of the arguments, and as these gentlemen give their opinion, so the cause is determined. These three personages are great in the law, and 'tis well, no doubt, that a deference is paid to their opinion in law matters. I have heard the Attorney and Solicitor-General, Advocate-General of Scotland, and diverse others, speak at the bars of this and t' other court. Many of 'em speak well, and yet, was I not afraid of offending your modesty, I would tell you that I think I have heard somebody in Connecticut speak as well as any of 'em.

I have not had the happiness of hearing Mr. Pitt speak in the House. He made a pretty alarming speech one day since my arrival, but I was so unhappy to be unwell that day. I have conversed with him at his own house. His manner is agreeable, but nothing very peculiar as to oratory is collatable, I think, from his private conversation.

And now what shall I say farther? If I should undertake to tell you how his Majesty and the several branches of the Royal family look, 't would be no very valuable piece of information, besides, you know already as much of that matter as you can by hearing.

Should I tell you Mr. Garrick is a very fine actor on the stage, 't would be no news to you; and what the political world are about I know no more than you, and 't is well if they all know what they are about themselves.

May success attend his Majesty's arms in America this campaign! Oh! that peace was again restored to the earth. Pray be so good as to let me hear from you. This much same as to Mr. Walker and all the brotherhood, whom I still hold in dear remembrance. Remember me to all friends, my own little flock, and, when you go that way, to the ever agreeable house of Chenward. I am, Sr., yr. sincere friend,

And very humble servant,
JARED INGERSOLL.

P. S.—I forgot to return you my unfeigned thanks for the letter you gave me to Mr. Jackson. He has been a very useful, good friend. I have sent you a Court Kallender for ye current year. I conclude you will have heard of Father Partridge's death ere this reaches you.

Yrs., etc., J. I.

LONDONDERRY, 15th March, 1760.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 8th November came to hand the 26th ult. I take notice of the several matters you are so good as to inform me of—some of a more publick, others of a more private nature.

We have heard of the great things done in the Plains of Abraham by the brave General Wolf, of which you make mention, and you, long ere now, must have heard of the great things done in Quiberace Bay by Sir Edward Hawke, and will also be informed, probably before this reaches you, that ye gallant Capt. Elliot, with an inferior force, has lately taken Mons. Thurot, with his whole party, after they had spread terror, even during all the last summer, through Scotland and Ireland, and after having landed and done considerable damage at Callickfergus, in Ireland, Thurot himself killed, etc.

I was a good deal entertained the other day in the House of Commons with some pretty high complimenting which this same affair occasioned between Mr. Elliot, one of the Commissioners of the Admiralty, brother to Capt. Elliot, above mentioned, and Mr. Charles Townsend, brother to Gen'l Townsend. Mr. Elliot made a pretty long speech, moving for leave to bring in a bill to establish a militia in Scotland as it is in England. In his speech he took notice of the good effects of the militia in England—how free the people were from apprehensions from threatened invasion last year, and what panick the people of Scotland and Ireland were under where they had no armed force, from their apprehensions of the landing of Thurot only. He also observed that the militia gentlemen and soldiery, in every instance where they had been tried, had given proofs of their valor equal to any of the king's troops, and among other things said he had ye pleasure of being able to remind the House that ye same gentleman who had signed the capitulation of Incheck was the gentleman who first laid upon the table the motion for establishing a militia in England (meaning Gen'l Townsend, who at that time sat over against Mr. Elliot, and who, it seems, has always been a great patron of the militia). When he had done, Mr. Townsend rose up, and in a few words enforced the same thing Mr. Elliot had been laboring, and then said he hoped the gentleman referred to by the honorable gentleman who spoke last, and to whom he had the honor of being nearly related, was not altogether undeserving of the honor he had done him, and that in his turn he was very happy in having it in his power to acquaint the House that it was owing to the very brave and gallant behaviour of that honorable gentleman's brother that those two kingdoms, Scotland and Ireland, were rid of those terrors and fears which Mons. Thurot had given them—that it was the brave Capt. Elliot (I speak it, says he, with an emotion which almost unmans me) who, with an inferior force, boldly attacked, twice boarded, took and destroyed this same Thurot, with his whole party, who had so long given trouble to the good people of the North, etc., etc. The House was quite thrown into an acclamation of joy and triumph. 'T was right it should be so. Praise is the first reward of military virtue. To be sure, we have done brave things lately, and seem to be, as to ourselves, almost ready to leave off as having conquered enough. But alas! tho' we are nearly out of the wood, I do n't know how long we must tarry for our friend and ally the King of Prussia. However, we will hope for the best and meet the event.

I was sensibly touched with the news of the death of that worthy good man, Dr. Wolcott. I was first informed of his death by my good friend, Mr. Rowland. Col. Fowler, too, it seems, continues unfit for publick business. I think the colony, in the loss of these two gentlemen, are deprived of two very valuable members. It might reasonably have been hoped and expected, according to the course of human things, that their publick services would have been continued much longer. However, there is no redemption from the grave. There is now no way of retrieving their loss but by some of your younger brethren taking their places, and, by frequent recollecting the agreeable patterns as much as may be, become other originals.

I am glad to find that the weapons of war are at last taken from the contending powers at New Haven and Windsor. Amen and Amen. Wallingford and the King of Prussia, it seems, must fight a little longer; I wish they may both very soon meet with a happy issue to all their disputes.

And do Jones and Cooke yet stand side by side in the docket of controversy? Methinks they fight after they are dead; I thought they, that is, their cause, had spent the very last breath before I came away. Well! if they love to fight for fighting's sake, let them fight on, I say; they have money enough, and I am quite sure that out of the much they spend, my good friend will have a little. Everybody must be about something; the great Mr. P. and Marshal Belisle are striving which shall get the most Indian land in America, and Mr. Jones and Mr. Cooke are contending which shall have most of good Mr. Croswell's old tenor.

I cannot tell you anything certainly about peace; there is much talk and much guessing about it; I have lately waged two small bets that there will not be a peace before the opening of another campaign. You must note I did not lay on that side because I had more reason to believe there would not be a peace soon than that there would, but merely because I thought it was the most comfortable side; for if I lose my wager, I am compensated by a peace, and sha' n't much mind my loss; and if I win, I have nothing to regret but the continuance of the war.

I did not intend to have wrote half so much when I sat down, having, as I thought, little or nothing to say, having lately despatched a pretty long epistle to you; but I find a pleasure in seeming to talk to you, tho' I say nothing worth hearing.

You won't omit to call on my little flock every time you go to New Haven. I expected to have been, by this time, informed of something preparative to my return home, but I find by a late letter from Gov. Fitch, that mine to the colony in which I mentioned some things relative to that matter, did not arrive before the rising of the assembly in October. I shall endeavor to make myself contented should I be obliged to tarry a little longer than at first I supposed would be needfull, but I fear if I am absent much longer, you will get your bar so crowded, that when I come you 'l think me an intruder amongst you.

I have sent you, agreeable to promise, a Court Kallender for the current year. There was two Knights of the Garter created soon after the impression, so not mentioned—they are the Earl Temple and Marquis of Rockingham, who are to be installed at Windsor next month—perhaps I may see the ceremony. I saw 'em dubb'd by the King when created, the particulars of which I may one day have the pleasure of giving you if agreeable. My compliments to all friends. When you write to me again, please, after the usual description in directing, to add New Palace Yard, being the place where I live, otherwise the letter may n't find me for a month after it arrives, for you must know most people here won't know anything but in their own way and according to their own rule and method; and if I should be present in the General Post-office when a letter should arrive directed to me in London generally, and I should tell the clerk in the office that held it in hand that I was the person to whom it was meant to go, a hundred to one but he would give it out to the carrier of the letters directed in that manner, to carry about and enquire after me a month, then to be returned, advertised, etc.; and if directed to be left at a coffee-house, they do n't always come to hand so quick as they should.

I am, Sr.,
Yr. cordial Friend,
And very Humble Servt.,
JARED INGERSOLL.

WM. S. JOHNSON, Esqr.

P. S.—I find on perusal the Court Kallender is of a later impression than I imagined. J. I.

The Largest, the Cheapest, and the Best Children's Paper in America.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

A FIRST CLASS PAPER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS,

Published Monthly, in Chicago, Ill., 138 Lake Street,

By ALFRED L. SEWELL.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL contains sixteen pages of first class literary matter. It is intended that it shall contain better original Stories, Poems, and other reading for children, and more matter for the price, than any other children's paper on the continent. First No. published July, 1865.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Though the paper itself is more than worth the price, yet for the sake of offering such an inducement as will ensure beyond all doubt a very large list of subscribers to start with, I have determined to give the following beautiful present to every subscriber for one year:

A Superb Quarto Steel Engraving,

THE CHILDREN'S PORTRAIT OF MR. LINCOLN,

Size, 9⅛ x 11¼ inches, engraved in the highest style of the art, expressly as a premium plate for this paper—which can be had nowhere else in this style.

This is the best portrait for children of our martyred President, and is alone worth more than many pictures that sell for one dollar, but is presented gratis to every subscriber for one year to The Little Corporal.

☞ SPECIMEN NUMBER WILL BE SENT ON RECEIPT OF TEN CENTS.

Address ALFRED L. SEWELL,
Care of Dunlop, Sewell & Spalding,
CHICAGO, ILL.

PREMIUMS TO CLUBS.

Every person who shall send six subscribers, and six dollars, will receive as a premium one extra copy for one year, and also a copy of the above Engraving.

Other inducements advertised in the paper for larger clubs.

READ WHAT THE PAPERS SAY:

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—This first class monthly for boys and girls is receiving commendatory notices from every part of the Union, and these, too, are from our first-rate newspapers. The following notice is from the Pittsburg Christian Advocate:

"'The first number is the best children's paper, of a high literary tone, that we have ever had the pleasure of reading. If after issues shall fulfil the promise of this avant courier, Chicago will have the honor of making the best child's paper in the nation. We bid a hearty welcome to The Little Corporal and trust it may long live to grace the catalogue of newspaper literature for children.'

"The July, August, and September numbers are before us, and we assure the Pittsburg Advocate and our young readers of the Northwestern that these 'after issues' are fully up to the standard of the first number, and more—they are far beyond it. The Little Corporal is growing in stature, and the muscles of his literary and moral arm are hardening with exercise.

"In plain terms, Mr. Sewell is determined to make his paper a success, and he has secured the services of able writers, for whose productions he pays liberally. We re-echo the words of the Chicago Evening Journal:

"'It is bright, sparkling, and promising, both in typography and contents. It already excels every children's paper that we know of in this country.'

"The periodical looks as if it had been printed by the 'Riverside Press.'—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

"A NEW CHILD'S PAPER.—We have received two copies of The Little Corporal, a monthly paper for children, the publication of which has been commenced at Chicago, Illinois, by Alfred L. Sewell. Judging from these specimens, it is the cleverest thing of its kind yet realized in America. Its whole appearance is in capital taste, and there is evidence in it that its editor has rare tact in catering for the wants of the little ones. The enterprise deserves to be a decided success."—Roxbury [Mass.] Journal, Aug. 5, 1865.

"THE LITTLE CORPORAL.—Bright, sparkling, and pure; a gem, both in typography and contents. We have been accustomed to think that the West, however she might excel in agricultural products, was far behind the East in literary matters; but we begin to think it is time for the latter to look to her laurels. Certainly we have seen nothing in the shape of a child's paper which could compare with this, which comes to us from over the prairies."—Portland [Maine] Daily Press.

"Judging from the appearance of the two numbers before us, The Little Corporal is destined to become the great children's paper of America.—Forney's Philadelphia Daily Press.

"We have read with great pleasure the first number of this entertaining periodical. We trust The Little Corporal will continue to fulfil the promise of this first number. Will the editor accept our congratulations?"—N. Y. Independent.

"We cannot say too much in favor of this beautiful paper."—Bryan [O.] Union Press

"The children will be better and happier from reading it."—Henry [Ill.] Courier.

"The Little Corporal really excels any child's paper we have seen. The premium picture is of itself worth a year's subscription."—Sandusky [O.] Reg.

TO MINISTERS THROUGHOUT THE UNITED STATES:

I desire to secure the co-operation of the MINISTERS throughout the country in the furtherance of a work which cannot fail to meet their approval and appreciation.

As editor of THE LITTLE CORPORAL, I hope to induce Ministers to favor the circulation of my paper among their children as a means of doing them good; and I ask each one to send me the name of some intelligent and respectable lady (for whose integrity they can vouch), who will be willing to energetically canvass her own neighborhood for subscribers to THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

Any Minister addressing me, as shown below, will receive by next mail Circulars, showing the opinions of the Press, and will also be informed in relation to the percentage allowed to canvassers.

AGENTS WANTED

FOR

BY ALBERT D RICHARDSON,

N. Y. Tribune Correspondent.

1,000 COPIES SELLING PER DAY!

The most interesting and exciting book ever published, embracing Mr. Richardson's unparalleled experience for four years. Travelling through the South in the secret service of The Tribune at the outbreak of the war, with our armies and fleets, both East and West, during the first two years of the Rebellion; his thrilling capture; his confinement for twenty months in seven different Rebel prisons; his escape, and almost miraculous journey by night of nearly 400 miles. It abounds in stirring events, and contains more of the fact, incident, and romance of the war than any other work yet published. Horace Greeley says of it:

"A great many books will yet be written concerning this war, in addition to the many already in print; but not one of them will give, within a similar compass, a clearer, fuller, more readable account, entirely from personal observation, of the nature, animus, purposes, tendencies, and instrumentalities of the Slaveholders' Rebellion, than does the unpretending narrative of Mr. Richardson."

Teachers, ladies, energetic young men, and especially returned and disabled officers and soldiers, in want of profitable employment, will find it particularly adapted to their condition. Send for Circulars. Address

DAVID WOODBURN,

MOUNTAIN MISSIONARY.

The scenes recorded in this volume have their unfolding in the wild and semi-civilized regions of the "Blue Ridge," in Western Virginia, and are a faithful record of individual experience.

"DAVID WOODBURN" had his birth and home in these mountain seclusions, and the history and abounding labors of this untaught youth form the main features of the work. While yet a rude and unlettered boy, he became a colporteur of the American Tract Society of New York for the "Mountains," and it is no exaggeration to say that the Society, in its widely extended and valuable labors, has never employed a worker of such tireless activity, or one on whom the divine blessing so manifestly rested. To give in this advertisement even a synopsis of his missionary toils and successes, would be to copy out the book itself. The publisher prefers to furnish the work in a handsomely bound and beautifully illustrated volume, at moderate cost, to those who are in sympathy with the noblest enterprise in which a Christian association can engage. By JAMES A. FROUDE, M.A., of Exeter College, Oxford. From the fourth London edition. In crown 8vo vols., price $2 50 each. Volumes 1–4 now ready.

Mr. Froude has shown in his admirable history what new results may be derived, even in the most beaten track, from a thorough investigation of the original authorities. His researches have thrown a flood of light over the personal character of Henry VIII., his relation to the great event of modern history, the reformation of religion in Europe and the British Isles, that it would be in vain to seek elsewhere.

The work has received the most favorable notices from the leading English journals, and has already passed through four editions in England. The vast amount of fresh and authentic materials which the author has brought to bear on the periods of which he writes, gives his work an interest and value beyond any previous history of the same events.

DANTE,

AS PHILOSOPHER, PATRIOT, AND POET. With an Analysis of the Divina Commedia, its Plot and Episodes. By Prof. BOTTA. 1 vol. crown 8vo, on tinted paper, $2 50.

"It is decidedly the best account of the poet that has appeared in the English language. It is careful, learned, discriminating, and eloquent—written in terse and eloquent English that is remarkable in the pen of an author not native to our soil. The analysis of the poem is full and philosophical, alive with Italian enthusiasm, yet calm and truly catholic in its humanity and trust."—New York Evening Post.

LITERARY NOTES.

OUR publishers are daily adopting more and more the example set them by the trade in England, by which a programme, announced in the spring and fall, gives notice of their intended operations, and the issue of the books themselves is crowded into a brief space of those two seasons. The plan must have its conveniences, because those reasons that cause its prevalence abroad do not apply to our book-buying public here. Their tastes and habits, indeed, would be better suited by a steady supply of reading matter, especially during the midsummer months, when it is most wanted, instead of being practically entirely cut off at that time. Thus Messrs. Ticknor & Fields have just put forth a list of books to be published between the present time and Christmas, consisting of more than thirty articles. It testifies forcibly to the activity of this well-known house, and may be divided into original works, English reprints, illustrated books, and collected works, second editions, etc. Among the first class are "Greece, Ancient and Modern," by President Felton of Harvard University, in two volumes 8vo, embracing four courses of Lowell lectures delivered by him; "Sea-side Studies in Natural History," by Elisabeth C. and Alexander Agassiz; "The Freedman's Book," by Lydia Maria Child; a work of great curiosity and research by Wm. A. Wheeler, "An Explanatory and Pronouncing Dictionary of the Noted Names of Fiction, including also Familiar Pseudonyms, Surnames bestowed on Eminent Men, etc.," in one vol. 12mo: the first sketch of this work was appended to the last edition of Webster's Dictionary, and is generally allowed to be the most amusing part of that solid and erudite quarto; "Poems," by Henry Howard Brownell, whose "Abraham Lincoln" in the October number of the "Atlantic" shows powers of no mean order; "Patriot Boys and Prison Pictures," by Edmund Kirke; "The Gulistan, or Rose Garden of Saadi, with Introduction by Ralph Waldo Emerson;" "Religious Poems," by Harriet Beecher Stowe; and several juvenile books by Grace Greenwood, Carleton, etc. The reprints of English books include Mr. Swinburne's famous pure classical tragedy, "Atalanta in Calydon;" "Life and Letters of Rev. Frederic Robertson, of Brighton," whose sermons have met with a general acceptance here that far outweighs their popularity in the land of their origin; Alexander Smith's prose poem, "A Summer in Skye," and the same author's "Miss Oona Macquarrie;" a sequel to "Alfred Hagart's Household;" and "Hereward, the Last of the English; a Story of the Norman Conquest," by Charles Kingsley. The illustrated books are rich in promise, and include a quarto edition of Tennyson's "Idyls of the King;" Longfellow's "Wayside Inn," with drawings by John Gilbert; "Legends and Lyrics," by Adelaide Procter, with twenty-one full-page illustrations by various artists, and a memoir by Charles Dickens; "Recreations of a Country Parson," with forty-one illustrations on wood by Joseph Swain, from original designs by R. I. Pritchett—the last three works are of English execution, but are published in this country by Ticknor & Fields; and the "Flowers of Liberty," quarto, with fifty colored illustrations. The American reprints and revised editions comprise "Humorous Poems," by Oliver Wendell Holmes, with illustrations by S. Eytinge; "Aldrich's Poems," in blue and gold; Keightley's London Elzevir edition of Shakespeare, in six volumes, in the same style; and "Atlantic Tales," a selection of the best stories from the 'Atlantic Monthly."

—A well-known statistician, Mr. Frederick Martin, illustrates the necessity for a new work he is preparing, "The Commercial Hand-book of France," by the fact that there is so little known at present about the actual state of French industry, that it created astonishment when, some weeks ago, the papers reported that the Great Eastern Railway was about to receive sixteen locomotives from the Creusot machine works in Bourgogne. To spread information respecting the trade, commerce, and general industry of France is the object of this book (to be published by Messrs. Longmans), and it is the more wanted from the immense interchange of commodities that has sprung up between the two countries since the relaxation of commercial restrictions. Many can remember when tariffs entirely separated the two countries, and the packets used to cross without the shadow of any trade being carried on between the opposite coasts within sight of each other. In fact, the trade of France—the immense empire lying at its doors—was less to England than that of some petty South American republic. In 1823 the imports and exports of the two countries did not average one million sterling. In 1863, each country imported from the other about twenty-five millions, and the trade was comparatively in its infancy. Mr. Martin's book will take the shape of a systematic practical guide to each industrial centre of French trade, manufactures, vineyards, etc., with full particulars of the railways, commercial marine, great industrial establishments, commercial statistics, etc., from the last official returns, and will embody much matter not now to be procured in English, and important to every business man.

—English art-biography, which lately receïved an important addition by Mr. Gilchrist's illustrated "Memoir of William Blake's Life and Works," will be further enriched by a forthcoming "Biography of William Hunt," the famous water-color painter, by J. G. Stephens. It will be illustrated in the only way that could convey an idea of the perfections of one whom Ruskin calls the first colorist of the day, that is, by finely executed chromo-lithographic fac-similes of his pictures, and wood-cuts. "One object of the work" (it is stated in the prospectus) "is to correct the common mistake of associating Hunt's name only with paintings of still life; the variety of his works is only less extraordinary than their beauty." We should have thought the popularity of his English rustic groups and figures was sufficient to show that this mistake could not be very general. A beautiful book may now be expected; it is to appear at Christmas, from the house of Messrs. E. Moxon & Co.

—Though not requiring notice under a literary heading, the great scientific dead of the past few weeks should not pass without commemoration in appropriate quarters. The summer has been fatal to astronomers. The list includes the name of Sir William Hamilton, astronomical professor at Trinity College, Dublin, a man often confounded with his better known namesake of Edinburgh, but who in natural powers of mind probably surpassed him, while by his discoveries in his own special branches of study, mathematics and astronomy, he was raised to an equality with the greatest extant names in science; Johann Franz Encke, the director of the Berlin Observatory, and oldest foreign member of the Royal Society, who died in the midst of his labors in his seventy-fifth year: his name is indissolubly connected with the comet whose rapid period of revolution (every three years) will never allow him to be forgotten; and Admiral William Henry Smyth, a sailor, a distinguished hydrographer, and accomplished amateur astronomer, who in each capacity performed work that deserves well of his countrymen.

—The vitality of old errors is matter of notoriety to all, especially to those who have examined the history of opinions and made themselves familiar with the speculations of theorists on the phenomena of society or science of politics. It is consolatory to know, however, that the same research which disinters the fallacy will usually find its corrective close at hand. We have lately seen paraded forth with much pretence, as an important contribution to the philosophy of history, the notion that states resemble men in their periods of youth, maturity, and decay. It would be impossible to demolish this idea, as presented in its latest phase, more effectually than has been done by Burke in the last century, when he said:

"I am not quite of the mind of those speculators who seem assured that necessarily, and by the constitution of things, all states have the same periods of infancy, manhood, and decrepitude that are found in the individuals that compose them. Parallels of this sort rather furnish similitudes to illustrate or to adorn, than supply analogies from whence to reason. The objects which are attempted to be forced into an analogy are not found in the same classes of existence. Individuals are physical beings—subject to laws universal and invariable. The immediate cause acting in these laws may be obscure; the general results are subjects of certain calculation. But commonwealths are not physical, but moral essences. They are artificial combinations, and in their proximate efficient cause the arbitrary productions of the human mind. We are not yet acquainted with the laws which necessarily influence the stability of that kind of work, made by that kind of agent."

Again touching on this subject (says his biographer Prior) in the letter to Mr. W. Elliot, he says, with a clear prescience of the practical evil of fatalistic ideas:

"I am not of opinion that the race of men and the commonwealths they create, like the bodies of individuals, grow effete and languid and bloodless, and ossify by the necessities of their own conformation and the fatal operation of longevity and time. These analogies between bodies natural and politic, though they may sometimes illustrate arguments, furnish no arguments of themselves. They are but too often used, under color of a specious philosophy, to find apologies for the despair of laziness and pusillanimity, and to excuse the want of all manly efforts when the exigencies of our country call for them more loudly."

—Mr. Richard Grant White's "Memoirs of Shakespeare's Life" meets with a carping notice in the Athenæum, written apparently more to ventilate certain crotchets of the writer's than to convey an accurate idea of the book reviewed. While complaining absurdly of "want of originality" (originality on such a well-worn topic!), the critic admits that "the author's enthusiasm for Shakespeare is great, his style crisp and pleasant, and his intention good." We believe Mr. White has not mentioned in his book a trifling fact that came to light a few years since, when Shakespeare's house at Stratford was being repaired on its coming into possession of the present trustees. In restoring the fire-place in the birth-room of the poet, the beam of the chimney-piece proved to be hollow, and in a carefully concealed cavity a cross and some apparently Catholic relics were found. Unimportant in itself, this incident may have some relation to the religious tendencies of the family of the great dramatist, who has himself been remarked to speak with unvarying respect of the priestly character and attributes. Criticism is so far from being exhausted on these themes that a new work by Mr. Gerald Massey is only just announced. It is entitled "Shakespeare's Sonnets, never before interpreted; with a Retouched Portrait of the man Shakespeare." It contains a new theory of the sonnets, according to which the greater portion of them—personal or dramatic—were written for the Earl of Southampton; the rest for William Herbert; and the story of Shakespeare's keeping a mistress, of whom he was robbed by his friend, vanishes into thin air. This analysis of the work is by no means clear of comprehension, but we must be satisfied with it till the book itself appears.

—Mr. Herman Merivale, who has displayed much historical acumen in his various writings, has just thrown a bomb-shell among English antiquarians by his attack on the authenticity of "The Paston Letters," contained in a late number of the "Fortnightly Review." The letters in question are well known by the continued reference made to them by modern historians, and especially by Mr. Charles Knight, for interesting facts illustrating the domestic life and relations of private persons in England that are nowhere else to be found. They purport to be the correspondence of various members of a knightly family in Norfolk that afterwards attained to the peerage (and shortly became extinct) during the time occupied by the wars of York and Lancaster. No similar series has been preserved in any part of the kingdom—a fact which, while it naturally increases the value of the letters for historical purposes, is now used as an argument against their authenticity. The entire disappearance of the originals is another circumstance that throws doubt on their claims, and Mr. Merivale endeavors to show, by an examination of numerous words and phrases of modern cast, that the language is not such as was current during the Wars of the Roses among the contemporaries of Gower, Wickliffe, and Chaucer. The question is a curious one for antiquarians and philologists; at present none have given in their adhesion to Mr. Merivale's "historic doubts." We think he scarcely allows sufficient weight to the idea that a degree of knowledge and dramatic talent necessary to create a fiction so vivid and minute of the lives, loves, and fortunes of the Pastons as these letters present, without any detected anachronisms, was very unlikely to fall to the lot of the editor by whom they were printed, a country gentleman of whom little is known. It may turn out, however, that a basis of truth existed, on which the love of mystification natural to the human mind erected the present superstructure. The original edition of the letters was in five volumes quarto (1787–1823), but they are well known in this country by a reprint, where they appear slightly abridged and modernized by Charles Knight, published in a volume uniform with "Bohn's Antiquarian Library."

—It is a noticeable fact in the progress of education in England that architecture as a study is now first introduced into a collegiate course. The programme of the lectures of Mr. T. Hayter Lewis, professor of architecture, University College, London, appears in the literary papers, and indicates a thorough teaching of his subject, both as a fine art and as a science. The first division will comprise a survey of the various national styles of art, including decoration, etc., from primeval times to the period of the Renaissance, and enters on the wide range of topics that are expected to meet in an accomplished architect. The science of construction forms the second portion of the lectures, and illustrates the requirements of the present day from the achievements of the past and the immutable laws of good sense and appropriateness. We can imagine no greater benefit to our community than a similar plan for the popularization of the same kind of knowledge among us. Almost every man of means has been, or expects to be, engaged in building of some nature, but not one in a myriad attempts to master the elements of the art that he is concerned with, and the consequence is that with the most lavish expenditure of money, exceeding anything known in other countries, the result is so unsatisfactory that we have scarcely a building to show in New York that fulfils in any decent measure the requirements of an educated taste.

—The chief of the peripatetic scientific bodies whose annual congresses now form a recognized feature of the autumn's entertainments in England—"The British Association"—has just held its thirty-fourth meeting at Birmingham, under the presidency of Prof. Phillips, the well-known geologist. Twice before had the smoky city been visited by the Association its infancy and youth (in 1839 and 1849), and the present meeting seems to have passed off to the satisfaction of all concerned. As usual, the opening address of the president is a valuable resumé of late discoveries in science, and maps out admirably the most active fields of philosophic energy. It was remarkable for a distinct recognition of the connection of geological phenomena with traces of the human family—"the opening of a new chapter, for archæology and palæontology to read, of the world's history, which begins in the pleistocene periods of geology, and reaches to the pre-historic ages of man." One of the most interesting papers of the meeting was sent to the Geographical section by a young gentleman, Mr. W. Chandless, a graduate of Cambridge, who has ascended the River Purus, one of the least known of the tributaries of the Amazon, and has mapped every mile of its course for 1,866 miles—the paper was illustrated by a map of the river twenty-three feet in length. In the Mathematical section the results of the recent experiments in gunnery, etc., at Shoeburyness, were embodied in a valuable communication on the "Materials used for Iron Ships," by Dr. Fairbairn and Mr. Tate; and, in short, the professors of every branch of science "put their best foot foremost" in presence of the assemblage of home and foreign savans and ladies, who were brought out by the fair weather in unusual numbers, so that the last Birmingham meeting of the Association is on record as a great success.

—Messrs. Roberts Brothers, of Boston, promise us an edition of Miss Jean Ingelow's "Songs of Seven," descriptive of seven periods in the life of woman, intended to appear in a style of unrivalled beauty and taste. The illustrations will combine some of the best efforts of English and American artists, and include the first published portrait of Miss Ingelow, engraved on steel from a recent photograph. Mrs. Farrar, in her pleasant "Reminiscences" (just published by Ticknor & Fields), explains how it is that we possess no likeness of Maria Edgeworth by the fact that she was so absolutely plain that she never would allow a portrait of herself to be taken. It was fortunate for her resolve that she lived in the pre-daguerreotype ages, or she could scarcely have escaped the momentary glance of the camera that now perpetuates indiscriminately for us both the evanescent shapes of beauty and grace as well as their opposites.

—Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co. have a book in preparation that will possess an attraction for New Yorkers equal, perhaps, to any that could be got up. It is "Reminiscences of Dr. Gardiner Spring," of the Brick church, including recollections, personal, professional, and miscellaneous, of the long career during which he has occupied a position of the first eminence in the ecclesiastical and social circles of our metropolis. Though past the age of eighty, Dr. Spring flourishes in the enjoyment of all his faculties, and the composition of these reminiscences has been a cherished employment of his leisure.

A FRENCH CRITIC.*

To the first series of these literary studies, published two years ago, M. Scherer attached a preface which he doubtless intends shall serve also for this second volume. A short glance at this preface will initiate us into the author's view of the limits of his own work. "Custom exacts," says M. Scherer, "that a preface should sum up the doctrines of the book. But suppose the book has no doctrines? I find many subjects handled in these pages: philosophy, religion, literature, history, politics, morals—there is a little of all these. If, indeed, I start no ideas on these subjects, I speak of men who have done so. But in the midst of all this I look in vain for the least sign of a doctrine. Nay, what is worse, the book seems to me to be full of inconsistencies, or, as some might say, of contradictions. I find myself to-day all latitude, and to-morrow all indignation; now a rigid moralist, now a disinterested critic; now tolerant as a philosopher, now strenuous as a partizan." To the critic duly reproached with these inconsistencies, pursues M. Scherer, there remains this resource: to accept the reproach, and to reduce it to its proper value. This M. Scherer proceeds to do in his own case. At bottom, he affirms, rightly understood, no serious mind ever contradicts itself. To accuse a man of so doing is simply to display covertly your own ignorance. How can we know those secret reasons, those blind instincts, those confused motives, which the subject of them himself only half suspects? We think that a man has changed when he has only pursued or achieved his natural manifestation. There are in the tyranny of circumstances and the inherent inflexibility of ideas a hundred obstacles to the complete expression of feelings. These feelings, which constitute a man's real substance, his inclinations, his affections, his aspirations, never change. The nearest approach they make to it is to develop by a strictly logical process. In default of doctrines in a work—or, as we should say, in default of a system, of a consistent argument—there is always, accordingly, a certain irrepressible moral substance. This moral substance in his own work M. Scherer declares to be the love of liberty. He loves liberty as the necessary condition of truth, of thorough examination, of impartiality. "Contention, written and spoken," says M. Scherer, "the opposition and the fusion of opinions, errors, retractions, excuses, reactions: all these things are the formation of truth." And these things are only possible under liberty. "Truth," he continues, "is for me simply improvement; and liberty is scarcely more than another name for this constant process of improvement."

M. Scherer's merits, then, as a critic, are these: that he has no doctrines, and that in default of these he is prompted by as excellent a feeling as the love of liberty. It may seem questionable at first whether the former fact is really a merit. It is not that in reading M. Scherer's volume we do not find much that is positive: many opinions, much sympathy, much dissent, much philosophy, much strong feeling; for without these the reproach of inconsistency would be impossible. We find much that we can specifically approve or condemn. We find even plenty of theories. But this touches perhaps the very point. There are plenty of theories, but no theory. We find—and this is the highest praise, it seems to us, that we can give a critic—none but a moral unity: that is, the author is a liberal. It is hard to say, in reading M. Scherer's books, which is the most pleasing phenomenon, this intellectual eclecticism or this moral consistency. The age surely presents no finer spectacle than that of a mind liberal after this fashion; not from a brutal impatience of order, but from experience, from reflection, seriously, intelligently, having known, relished, and appropriated the many virtues of conservatism; a mind inquisitive of truth and of knowledge, accessible on all sides, unprejudiced, desirous above all things to examine directly, fearless of reputed errors, but merciless to error when proved, tolerant of dissent, respectful of sincerity, content neither to reason on matters of feeling nor to sentimentalize on matters of reason, equitable, dispassionate, sympathetic. M. Scherer is a solid embodiment of Mr. Matthew Arnold's ideal critic. Those who affirmed Mr. Arnold's ideal to be impracticable may here be refuted; those who thought it undesirable may perhaps be converted. For they will see that once granted M. Scherer's seriousness, his competency to the treatment of a given subject rests entirely upon his intellectual independence or irresponsibility. Of all men who deal with ideas, the critic is essentially the least independent; it behooves him, therefore, to claim the utmost possible incidental or extrinsic freedom. His subject and his stand-point are limited beforehand. He is in the nature of his function opposed to his author, and his position, therefore, depends upon that which his author has taken. If, in addition to his natural and proper servitude to his subject, he is shackled with a further servitude, outside of his subject, he works at a ridiculous disadvantage. This outer servitude may either be to a principle, a theory, a doctrine, a dogma, or it may be to a party; and it is against this latter form of subordination, as most frequent in his own country, that Mr. Arnold more especially protests. But as a critic, quite as much as any other writer, must have what M. Scherer calls an inspiration of his own, must possess a unit of sincerity and consistency, he finds it in his conscience. It it on this basis that he preserves his individuality, or, if you like, his self-respect. It is from this moral sense, and, we may add, from their religious convictions, that writers like Scherer derive that steadfast and delicate spiritual force which animates, coordinates, and harmonizes the mass of brief opinions, of undeveloped assertions, of conjectures, of fancies, of sentiments, which are the substance of this work.

There are, of course, degrees in criticism as in everything else. There is small criticism and there is great criticism. But great criticism seems to us to touch more or less nearly on pure philosophy. Pure criticism must be of the small kind. Goethe is a great critic; M. Sainte-Beuve is a small one. Goethe has laid down general principles. M. Sainte-Beuve has laid down particular principles; and, above all, he has observed facts and stated results. Goethe frequently starts from an idea; M. Sainte-Beuve starts from a fact: Goethe from a general rule, M. Sainte-Beuve from a particular instance. When we reflect upon all the faculties and all the accomplishments needed by the literary critic in these days, we are almost tempted to say that he should unite in himself the qualities which are required for success in every other department of letters. But we may more strictly sum up his necessary character by saying that he is a compromise between the philosopher and the historian. We spoke of M. Sainte-Beuve, who, on the whole, may be called the first of living critics. He is a philosopher in so far as that he deals with ideas. He counts, weighs, measures, appraises them. But he is not a philosopher in so far as that he works with no supreme object. There results from his work no deliberate theory of life, of nature, of the universe. He is not, as the philosopher must ever be more or less, a partizan. When he pulls down, it lies in his discretion or his generosity to build up again; whereas the philosopher is for ever offering the better in exchange for the worse—that which is more true in exchange for that which is less. The philosopher's function is to compare a work with an abstract principle of truth; the critic's is to compare a work with itself, with its own concrete standard of truth. The critic deals, therefore, with parts, the philosopher with wholes. In M. Sainte-Beuve, however, it is the historian who is most generously represented. As a critic, he bears the same relation to facts that he does to ideas. As the metaphysician handles ideas with a preconceived theory, so the historian handles facts with a preconcerted plan. But with this theory or this plan, the critic has nothing to do. He works on the small scale, in detail, looking neither before him, behind him, nor on either side. Like Mr. Ruskin's model young painter with his landscape, M. Sainte-Beuve covers up all history but the small square field under his eye. On this field, however, he works with pre-Raphaelite minuteness; he exhausts it. Then he shifts his window-frame, as we may call it, and begins again. The essence of the practicability of history is in a constant obedience to proportion. M. Sainte-Beuve, like a true critic, ignores proportion. The reunion of his chapters, therefore, would make no history, any more than the reunion of the young pre-Raphaelite's studies would make a picture.

M. Scherer's place among the critics of the time is very high. If M. Sainte-Beuve has earned the highest place, M. Scherer has a claim to the next. For ourselves, we prefer M. Scherer. He has not M. Sainte-Beuve's unrivalled power of reproducing the physiognomy of a particular moment as of a particular figure of the past; he cannot pick out some obscure secondary figure of the seventeenth century—some forgotten littérateur, some momentary king's mistress—and in twenty pages place the person before you as a complete human being, to be for ever remembered, with a distinct personality, with a character, an expression, a face, a dress, habits, eccentricities. M. Scherer, we say, has not done this. But we prefer him because his morality is positive without being obtrusive; and because, besides the distinction of beauty and ugliness, the æsthetic distinction of right and wrong, there constantly occurs in his pages the moral distinction between good and evil; because, in short, we salute in this fact that wisdom which, after having made the journey round the whole sphere of knowledge, returns at last with a melancholy joy to morality.

If we have a complaint, indeed, to make of M. Sainte-Beuve, it is that with all his experience he is not more melancholy. On great subjects, subjects of the first order, M. Scherer is as efficient as the author of the "Causeries de Lundi." He has judged his contemporaries quite as keenly: witness his article on M. Veuillot. And in the volume under notice are two papers, one on Mme. de Sévigné, the other on Mme. Roland, which are delicate with all M. Sainte-Beuve's delicacy, and eloquent with more than his eloquence. If we were tempted to set another critic above M. Scherer, that critic would be M. Taine. But on reflection we conclude that M. Taine is not pre-eminently a critic. He is alternately a philosopher and a historian. His strong point is not to discriminate shades of difference. On the contrary, he is perpetually sacrificing shades to broad lines. He is valuable for his general views, his broad retrospects, his résumés. He passes indeed, incidentally, very shrewd literary judgments, as when, for instance, he says of Swift's poetry that instead of creating illusions it destroys them. But he is too passionate, too partial, too eloquent. The critic is useful in repairing the inevitable small injustices committed by other writers; in going over the ground after them and restoring the perverted balance of truth. Now in Taine's "History of English Literature," which is nominally a critical work, there is in each chapter abundant room for this supplementary process of the critic proper. In the work of M. Scherer there is room but for contradiction—which is in fact, a forcible making of room. With him, analysis has reached its furthest limits, and it is because he is more analytic than Mr. Taine—admitting, as we do, that he has not his genius—that we place him higher as a critic. Of M. Scherer's religious character we have not explicitly spoken, because we cannot speak of it properly in these limits. We can only say that in religion, as in everything else, he is a liberal; and we can pay no higher tribute to his critical worth than by adding that he has found means to unite the keenest theological penetration and the widest theological erudition with the greatest spiritual tolerance.

HESPERUS.*

Mr. Brooks has conferred a real benefit on the public by his translations from Jean Paul—by other translations also, but particularly by these; for these are much the best he has done, and they are by far the most difficult he has attempted, if we except the "Faust" of Goethe, the difficulty of which lay not in the translation, but in the versification, in the execution of which Mr. Brooks displayed an immense amount of ingenuity, with but doubtful success. To read Jean Paul in the original at all is a task; to read one of his great books through is a serious labor; to read several of them through is a toil for more than mortal strength; but to translate the most arduous of them, and to translate them well, admirably well, all but perfectly well, as Mr. Brooks does, argues something miraculous in the way of energy.

Mr. Brooks has peculiar qualifications for such a work. He is patient, assiduous, painstaking, persevering, accurate. He is not content till he has made his version as perfect as he can make it. He is a humorist, and can do justice to the comic portions of his author; he is something, though not quite enough, of a poet, and can appreciate the highly imaginative forms with which Richter clothes his thought. If he has a defect, however, it lies in a deficiency of the poetic spirit. Richter was a gorgeous prose-poet; he deals in the language of symbols; his pages are wreaths of metaphor; and though he often uses phrases that savor slightly of vulgarity, he does so saturate the paragraphs with feeling that the coarseness does not offend. The translator's eye detects the coarseness, but his mind cannot reproduce in another language the luxury of emotion; so he is apt to spoil his version by his very fidelity. Mr. Brooks does this sometimes. An instance of it occurs on page 116, and another on page 119, of the first volume. In the first case the version runs literally, "The evening blood (abendblut) of the sinking sun flowed into the clouds, as into the sea sinks (flows?) the blood of its giants dying in its depths. The porous cloud (lockene Gewölke—we should prefer the word "loose" or "scattered") did not avail to hide the heavens; it swam round about the moon, and let her pale silver glisten from amidst the slags." The word "slags" spoils the sentence. It is a literal version of the original (Schlacken) to be sure, but the word schlacken is not so rude a word as "slags," and, besides, it is not the closing word of the sentence. The thought passes over it to the word blicken, and finds its way out into the moonlight. The second passage alluded to is Englished thus: "Overhead Luna fills the floating cloud-fleeces with liquid silver, and the soaked silver wool quivers downward, etc." "Soaked silver wool quivers downward" is a "vile phrase." In the German it is "getränkte Silberwolke zittert." Why not say, "The fleece saturated with silver radiance drops tremblingly downward?" This may seem like hyper-criticism, but it is all the criticism we have to make, unless we blame generally the eccentric literalness with which Mr. Brooks transfers the German phrase to the English. Such expressions as "rat-contradictor," "throne incumbent," "correferent," are not legitimate. "Antiquated tears" is not good. But the volumes are wonderfully well rendered into racy and varied vernacular. Richter says of himself in this very novel: "Reinhold read Kant's 'Critique' through five times before he understood it. I pledge myself to be more intelligible to him, and require to be read only half as often." In another place he says, as if in a kind of despair: "By heavens! people actually rush and leap into my work as into a passengers' room, and neither reader nor devil knows who their dogs and cats are." Very true; we doubt if anybody ever understood "Hesperus" from a single reading; and we doubt whether many have taken pains to peruse it time, times, and half a time, as its author demands.

This was one of Jean Paul's earliest works, written while he was still very poor, and trying to maintain himself and his mother by teaching—in 1794—he being then thirty-one years old. He seems to have begun it under the enthusiasm excited by the success of the "Invisible Lodge," his first serious production. In "Hesperus" he first signed his literary name, Jean Paul. The success of the book was eminent in a literary though not in a pecuniary point of view. He was paid for it but two hundred Prussian dollars. But he earned a fame outside of Germany, and the intimacy of the most famous men of letters in it. He calls it a biography. That in any intelligible sense it is not. It can hardly be called a story. The names of a few personages are conspicuous in it—Horion, Victor, Firmin, Emanuel, Matthiew, Clotilde—but the personages themselves flit vaguely about like shadows in a deep red sunsetting, crossing one another, embracing, flitting away, magnified for a moment against the background of sky, and then dissolving in dew. They are more like disembodied spirits than like men and women. Victor is the hero: Clotilde is the heroine; but of Clotilde we get no definite conception through the book, and Victor is a grand outline, filled in with gorgeous colors, laid on in confused masses, which make him look like the promise of several fine people. But Victor does not fairly come to life as an active man. He remains to the end in the condition of an immature sentimentalist. Emanuel is an enthusiast, whose being is made up of odors and flowers—a creature of ecstacies and raptures, who scarcely seems to know whether he is in the body or out of it, imagines that he can will himself out of it whenever he pleases, and is at last made aware of the reality of things by the explosion of a powder-house. Then, "his soul, like the mourning tree of Goa, let fall by day the nightly load of blossoms; to his chilled head turned no longer the meadow side of poetry, but the light side of cold reason. He confessed that he had contemplated the earth, not from the earth, but too much from Jupiter, seen from whose observatory it must needs dwindle to a fiery spark, and that he had therefore lost the earth without getting Jupiter instead."

As a work of art "Hesperus" is a failure. Its plot is improbable; its characters undefined; their relations to one another unnatural; the thread of the story is broken and taken up a thousand times; every few pages comes an episode, an essay, a rhapsody. We have "intercalary days," "stray leaves," "extra stray leaves," "extra fly leaves," "leaflets," "poor little extra syllables," "circulating libraries," "comedies," fancy names all for his delicious ramblings into disquisition. The man is too rich in ideas and imagery to tell a straightforward tale. His invention of narrative is thin; his dialogue is scanty and poor; his observation of men and manners limited. Whoever takes up this book as a story will be disappointed; but whoever takes it up as a magnificent poem will be delighted beyond measure. The pages are studded with jewels of thought, and they sparkle in the translation as brilliantly as in the original language. There is no end of the wit, the humor, the pathos, the bloom and freshness of sentiment, the swift intuitions, the keen criticisms, the tender humanities, the noble vision of the future for man and society, the flashes of intelligence thrown upon the outward and the inward life. We began to read, pencil in hand, intending to mark for quotation such short passages as were characteristic of the author's genius; but before we had read fifty pages we had noted enough to occupy all the space covered by this article. Richter was too much a sentimentalist to be a great philosopher. He did not think his way far, but he felt his way into almost everything; he could not discuss, but he could prophesy. He could not describe, but he could glow and rhapsodize. He had no doctrines, but he was brimming over with knowledge and with truths.

Mr. Brooks thinks he sees indications that Jean Paul is to be better and better understood and appreciated among us "in this free and forming Western world." We hope he does; but we much doubt it. Our people certainly, would be vastly the better for such a flood of warm humanities as this "Hesperus" would pour down upon them, but such humanities are not so coveted that they will patiently go through an indefinite amount of particularly hard reading to come at them. They have but a minute and a glance to spare. What they read must be written in very large letters and illustrated.

Jean Paul will never be popular in America. The few will take the trouble to know him; but all who know him will love him.

THE ANNUAL CYCLOPÆDIA.*

This work, though very useful and well conceived, is marred by defects that would be serious in a book of any kind, and are doubly serious in a cyclopædia, which, whatever else it may want, ought to possess accuracy in the smallest as well as in the greatest things. It displays so much inaccuracy, and this of a kind that is unhappily only too prevalent in books intended for popular use, that we cannot help calling attention to it. By drawing the proofs of this assertion from a large number of the minor articles, we shall avoid the risk of fastening on a few contributors the blame of defects which are apparently the result of careless editing.

* "The American Annual Cyclopædia and Register of Important Events of the Year 1864." New York: Appleton & Co. 1865.

Of this general carelessness the title of the book itself affords us the first striking illustration. This title is "Annual Cyclopædia." So we find it on the title-page and in most of the numerous references to the earlier volumes, but not in all. In various articles we find "Annual Cyclopedia" (pages 168, 394, 591, 806). It is a harmless misprint, but characteristic. Similarly harmless misprints are "*Eu*cador," twice, for "Ecuador," "*Gau*temala" for "Guatemala," and "Perfirio" for "Porfirio" (Diaz), all in one short article ("America"). More strangely incorrect is "Uru*agai*an" for "Uruguayan" (page 806). Errors of this kind, of course, will mislead and perplex no reader; but there are others which will, and which cannot be charitably attributed to a slight oversight only. Thus, in the article "Dembinski," which is abridged, and in great part literally copied from the "New American Cyclopædia," the Maros, one of the great rivers of Hungary, is called "*W*aros," and the fortress of Arad "*A*vad." The Bohemian or Czech nationality is miscalled "Cze*k*" (p. 162), and the Venetian province of Treviso "Trevesa" (p. 443). The heathen satirist Lucian receives the name of the brother of Napoleon, Lucien (p. 457).

The "Annual Cyclopædia" has the laudable ambition of printing foreign words and names not in the vulgar know-nothing way in which most of the English and American publishers indulge, but as they are printed in the respective countries, with their accents and other distinctive marks. In this, having a good model, the "New American Cyclopædia," before it, it is partly successful; but the exceptions are, unfortunately, too numerous. We find "detour," "Credit," "Liege," "Ardeche," "Pages," "Gerard," "Halevy," "Cha*t*eaubriand," etc., without the necessary accents. The name of the Hungarian traveller, Vámbéry, is printed "Va*m*béry" throughout the article on "Geographical Explorations." Real ignorance of the French language is evinced by connecting in "Union Chrétien" (p. 21) a feminine noun with a masculine adjective. "Credit Mobile" (p. 367) stands for "Crédit Mobilier." "Enger Reichsrath" (p. 160) is incorrect in German, the adjective being here in the comparative degree (engere). A grosser error is contained in the Latin title, "Novum Testamentum Hellenicæ" (p. 417). Contrary to the rule, observed in most of the articles, of giving the titles of non-English journals in italics, we find, in the article "Roman Catholic Church," the following unitalicized: "Le Temps," "La France," "Monde," "La Paix," and "Bien Public." Other exceptions are "Estafette" and "La Cronica." On the other hand, we find the title of an English journal, the "Calcutta Englishman," in italics (p. 435).

Various languages are frequently mixed up. The names of the reigning king of Bavaria are given thus: "Ludwig Otto Frederick Wilhelm," the first and the last in German, and the two middle ones in English. "Karl Theodor*e*" (p. 593) is a similar connection. The article "Schleswig-Holstein" speaks of one German prince, "Wilhelm of Würtemberg," in German, and of others, "Frederic of Augustenburg" and "Frederic Charles of Prussia," in English, by-the-bye, also discarding throughout the form "Frederi*ck*," used everywhere else. The Christian names of Prince Couza, of Moldo-Wallachia, and of the Italian prime minister, General La Marmora, are given neither in their respective languages nor in that of the "Cyclopædia," but in French, "Alexandre" (p. 776) and "Alphonse" (p. 440). The traveller Munzinger receives, on one page (404), the French title "M." and the German "Herr." Gerlach (p. 727) and Zedlitz (p. 742), are each a "Baron de;" Egloffstein (p. 395) a "Baron Von" (capital V, to make it the funnier.)

The greatest inconsistency and inaccuracy prevail in rendering geographical names belonging to countries beyond the limits of the United States. Chili is always called so in the respective article and in "America," but "Chil*e*" in "Peru" and in "Geographical Explorations;" the latter article has "Chil*i*an" and "Chil*e*an." Independent Tartary is called "Tur*ki*stan" and "Toork*i*stan" in "Asia" and "Tur*ke*stan" in "Geographical Explorations" and in "Telegraph." One of its provinces is "Bal*kh*" in "Asia" and "Bal*k*" in "Telegraph." What is, correctly, "Yeddo" in "Japan" is "Jeddo" in "Telegraph," and "Yedo" in "Asia." What is the island of "Funen" in "Denmark" is "F*ühn*en" in "Schleswig-Holstein." We find "D*u*sseldorf" for "Düsseldorf;" "Ma*h*e" for "Ma*hé*;" "Sam*e*chonitis" for "Samochonitis;" "Gom*u*sh-Tépé" for "Gömüsh-Tepé;" "Nurem*b*urg" for "Nuremberg;" "Baki" for "Baku;" "Kiew" for "Kiev;" "Posnania" for "Posen;" "Eck*en*förde" for "Eckernförde;" the French names of "Kalouga" "Soudan," and "Dahomé," for "Kalooga," "Soodan," and "Dahomey;" the German "Kam*tsch*atka" for "Kamtchatka;" and both the correct and incorrect forms of "Novgorod" and "Novogorod," "Saghalien" and "Sa*kh*alin," "Herat" and "Hérât" (repeatedly in "Geographical Explorations"), "Würtemberg" and "Würtemb*u*rg," "Strasbourg" and "Strasb*u*rg" "Neumünster" and "Neu m*u*nster." "Lombardo-Venice" (p. 160) stands for "Lombardo-Venetia." The name of the well-known palace near St. Petersburg is distorted into Tsarko Celo" (p. 415).

Foreign names of persons or nations are rendered with equal carelessness. We find Russian family names terminating in f, side by side with others terminating in ff, though the original sound is the same; thus: "Pashkoff," "Zriakoff," and "Tchernaieff," but also "Babkof" and "Kisselef." "Mot*sch*ulsky" is spelled in the German way; "Bernstorff" also "Bernstorf." Ranke, the German historian, is called "Ranké;" Degérando, "Gérando;" Gen. Bosak, "Bos*sack*." "German-Slavonic" (p. 161) stands for "Germano-Slavic;" "Rasco*a*lnik*i*" (p. 728) for "Rascolniks." The "sect of Mohammedan purists," called "Wahab*is* or Wahabites" in "Geographical Explorations," are called "Wahab*ies*," and their religion "Wahab*ee*ism" in "India."

The article "Confederate Congress" shows with what little pains some of the compilations have been executed. Although no reference whatever is made to Southern documents, newspapers, or reports, which would explain the Southern stand-point occupied in the whole narrative, the debates are told by the Northern compiler in the following way:

"Mr. Barksdale, of Mississippi, said that it was no harm to say that we needed troops."

"Mr. Smith had never heard that free negroes had done anything good to our cause."

"Mr. Chamblin, of Virginia, . . . was quite as willing to trust free negroes in the army as slaves, however much we might be attached to the latter class. . . . If our cause failed, this Congress would be handed down to posterity with contempt." . . .

"Mr. Turner . . . did not believe that the United States Government would listen to any terms which we could offer."

"Mr. McMullen proceeded to urge that our Government should take some initial steps looking to bringing the war to a termination."

"Mr. Chambers confessed that desertions in our army were great, but not half so great as in the Yankee army."

In a similar way, the article "Belgium," written after an English authority, states sums in English pounds instead of in francs or dollars.

The same want of critical attention is the source of numerous errors in facts and dates. Louis Napoleon was not elected president, as the article "France" states, on "November 10," but on December 10, 1848, which caused him to be called by his partisans, as the writer ought to remember, l'élu du Dix Décembre. He did not assume the imperial dignity on "December 1," but on December 2, the anniversary of the battle of Austerlitz and of the coup d'état. The latter was not executed in 1852, as stated in the life of "Mocquard," but in 1851, as given in "France." The last-named Frenchman was in that act the confidant and adviser of no "imperial master," there being no emperor as yet. There are no 14,000,000 persons speaking Provençal in France, as asserted in the article on that empire. Totals are not to be given, as is done in the same, under statistical tables in which marks of interrogation replace numerous unknown numbers. Austria has not been a constitutional monarchy "since 1849;" the passage on that empire which makes this statement itself refutes it in the subsequent lines. Turkey is not only "an empire in Eastern Europe," but also in Asia and Africa. The ancient name of the Syr-Daria was not Jihon (p. 402), but Jaxartes. Donetz is a river, and not a place, as "from Donetz" (p. 402) implies. The duchies of Schleswig and Holstein have not been "dependencies of the crown of Denmark," but only united with it by the ties of a personal dynastic union. Russia has not yet conquered Toorkistan or subjugated Khiva and Khokand, as is asserted in "Russia," on the authority of a sensation article in the "Bombay Gazette," and literally repeated in "Asia."

The distribution and arrangement of matter shows a particular want of editorial care. Upwards of 130 pages are devoted to "Congress," 118 to "Army Operations," besides what is given under "Army," "Navy," and "Navy Operations;" the article "France" tells you over again that that country is an empire in Europe, that the name of the emperor is Napoleon III., and that the same committed a coup d'état in 1851; the article on "Great Britain" informs you that London is its capital, but you look in vain, in this alphabetical book on the current events of both hemispheres, for a single passage on the history or statistics of Switzerland, Portugal, Sweden, Holland, or (except in connection with "Schleswig-Holstein") Prussia, or Germany! No such article is to be found. "Poland" is referred to (p. 368), but is not given. Three articles are referred to in succession at the beginning of "Obituaries," none of which is to be found: "Rogers, G. W.," "Wayland, John," and "Tappan, B." There is a superabundance of American obituaries, but only a few European ones are given as biographies. "Literature and Literary Progress," though teeming with titles, refers exclusively to America; English publications are mentioned at the end, only in statistical figures; the productions of the French, German, or Italian press are not even alluded to.

These are some of the defects or errors of the "Annual Cyclopædia," the list of which could easily be enlarged; but our readers will have observed that they are mainly defects of arrangement or revision, or impair only those parts of the work which are secondary in its plan. As a book of reference on the current history of the United States it has undeniable merits, which will make it a valuable addition to every private library.

THE BLADE AND THE EAR.*

THE human mind might conceive of circumstances of deplorable desolation, under which the young men for whom this book is written would be reduced to read it; but the imagination shrinks from conjecturing them, as from figuring those extreme cases of suffering in which starving men have stayed their hunger with broth made from old boots, or have cheated their thirst by chewing shreds of rope and chips of wood. It is so utterly empty of genuine inspiration, that Charles Lamb's desire to examine the bumps of the poor gentleman who asked Wordsworth if he did not think Milton was a great poet, was not more vehement than our own longing to know something of the life and personal presence of a man who, in this day, could write, print, and publish a book for young men, in order to tell them that the destinies of the country were in their hands; that they ought to be respectful and tender to their mothers and sisters; that the society of pure women was very good indeed, and the friendship of loose women very immoral and hurtful; that they should take care to cultivate their minds, and should be wise in their choice of reading; that the style of the Bible was fine, and that it would be well to read the Bible.

Mr. Muzzey smells the commonplace afar off, and has an infallible instinct for the dulness of others: when he has

> "Said an undisputed thing
> In such a solemn way" of his own that it seems impossible any one else could ever have been as owlish about it, he is certain to surprise you with some quoted heaviness. He has remembered from the works and sayings of great men whatever was least fresh and valuable in their thought, and has reproduced it here with a seriousness unspeakably amusing. Perhaps we may give a fair notion of the quality of his mind when we describe him as one who sets great store by the views of the great concerning things not part of their greatness: that he values a statesman's approval of works to which the statesman could hardly have given his best thought, and prizes Byron's testimony to the beauty of virtues which he knew only by observation.

But we should be unjust to Mr. Muzzey if we did not let him speak briefly in this and other matters for himself. Concerning female influence, let us attend to his words:

"Said Napoleon the First, 'I win nothing but battles. Josephine, by her goodness, wins all hearts.' So long as he yielded to her potent sway, the lion in him was tempered by the lamb; but from the very hour he madly divorced her from his side, his fortunes began to wane; her wisdom and her love banished from him, his sun went down at noon."

This is a lesson which we should all heed. Now listen to Mr. Muzzey on the evils of society in Chili, where, as in most Latin countries, young people see very little of each other before marriage:

"And what is the effect of this course on the young men? They have little or no conversation with the young ladies; and, instead of being seen in their elevating society, may be found, if not in worse places, resorting to the tailor's shop to discuss fashions, or the public parlor or promenade to display ultra fine garments."

We know that we are very wicked in this country, and that we are growing worse; but we cannot but hope it will be long before we touch the depth of shame in which we here behold the youth of Chili plunged. All of us, certainly, are not yet given over to this childish frivolity of occupation, for Mr. Muzzey, illustrating the beauty of culture, says:

"I know a young merchant of cultivated mind, who paid a large sum from his early acquired means, for a painting by Raphael; and he is none the poorer for the sacrifice, I believe, now."

But, we doubt, much poorer for the picture if he believes it authentic; though we must agree with Mr. Muzzey in the general opinion that it is "better far to adorn your room with a fine painting or statue, than expend your superfluous earnings on lusts that inflame, and appetites that degrade, the immortal mind."

The author of this book tells us that he has written it because he was a youth once himself. Pare impossibile! Can the man who addresses all this pitiless rubbish to the young ever have been young? Can he recall days in which he drank eagerly and hopefully of the generous wisdom in which he tasted the freshness and vitality of immortal youth, but fled in derision from the founts that threw up dry dust and ashes instead of living waters? Mr. Muzzey is mistaken: he never was a youth himself, or he would know now that he who writes a very dull book for the guidance and moral instruction of young men, is a poor friend to virtue.

WORKS OF ART NOW ON EXHIBITION.

I.—PICTURES.

AT Mr. Knoedler's gallery is a small picture by J. J. Tissot. This eminent painter has become known to most Americans but very recently. Photographs from several of his pictures were to be seen and for sale two years ago in New York; last fall and winter Mr. Schaus had photographs of the whole series of illustrations from Faust and of the two larger pictures, the "Prodigal Son's Departure and Return." Two other photographs from large pictures have come since. The recently published "Ballads of Brittany," by Tom Taylor, of which a few copies have reached America, contains two illustrations engraved from designs by this painter. But, so far as we are informed, only two original pictures have ever been brought to America—"Margaret at the Fountain," which was at Mr. Avery's art agency last spring, and was still in New York a week ago; and this later arrival, "Faust and Margaret in the Garden."

In all Mr. Tissot's work the most remarkable trait is its reality of conception. The common affectation of picture-making and grouping is not only absent from his pictures, it is contradicted by every line and hue. If there were to be detected any affectation at all, it would be an affectation of naturalness. The larger, more important, more elaborate the picture, the more forcibly does the painter insist, in the disposition of his figures, on off-hand and natural-looking positions and grouping. There is the same difference between the action and expression of his figures, and the action and expression of figures in such pictures as "Washington crossing the Delaware," that there is between the bearing and tone of an accomplished actor and the gesticulations and gasps of a ranter. If any student of art, longing for a compact answer to the popular laudation of the stagy and tricky in art, should wish to see or to possess a complete specimen of naturalness of conception, he is refered to "The Prodigal's Return," where nearly twenty figures in the near foreground are all at once full of astonished or impassioned expression, and many of them in violent action as well, and where all are as unlike the ordinary models, and show as little evidence of having been made up to order, as if "instantaneously" photographed from the actual scene.

In the picture before us a wooden settle occupies the very centre of the picture, and is set so as to front the spectator squarely. Faust and Margaret sit side by side, but in no conventional lovers' attitude; Gretchen is picking off the leaves of the Sternblume, and Faust watching the oracle; and both are as regardless of possible lookers-on as they are of the Mephistopheles whose face is just visible through a grating in the wooden screen behind.

The truest reality in art is the work of the imagination in its greatest strength. Of penetrative imagination we find not many signs in the works of M. Tissot—of creative imagination still fewer. Their singular freedom from unreal absurdity is, we think, the result of good judgment; the marvellous reality seems to us rather reasoned out than instinctively felt. In the picture before us, the way it was done is, indeed, rather too visible. Simple and true as the thought is, it is not deep and subtle, but is rather no illustration of the story at all, only a re-wording of it.

It would require a careful examination of many works of the artist to enable one to determine, with tolerable certainty, his reason for representing Margaret as so uninteresting a girl. The Gretchen of Goethe's play is beautiful, if we are to believe either her brother or Faust, and if the natural prejudice of one and the hell-draught drank by the other make their evidence on this point valueless, we still are assured that she was noble, true, and sweet. The burgher maiden, as M. Tissot has fancied her, is certainly less intelligent and less elevated in character than we have learned to believe Valentine's sister, Faust's would-be savior, the ransomed saved one of the prison scene, the rejoicing angel of the mighty close. If we are right in believing that the realism of this and other pictures is rather reasoned out than felt, it is not surprising to see an inferior type of woman chosen for Margaret.

This picture, however, is by no means a favorable specimen of the master. To speak only of what can be seen in New York, the larger "Margaret at the Fountain" is very much more valuable and of higher rank as a work of art. And the still more elaborate and larger pictures are, almost in proportion to their magnitude, artistically better. There is something painful, as we look at the accessories, in the faultless, unsurpassable painting of the wooden settle, contrasted with the very insufficient drawing and entire ignoring of local color in the fruit trees behind. These fruit trees are a blot on the picture, which would at once be better if they were away. The blossoms and the soft, tender pale-green leaves of spring are not rightly drawn, and, indeed, are not drawn at all, only suggested or hinted at, and that in the feeblest way. It is not easy to see any signs of growth whatever in these plants, large or small, for the leaves and blossoms do not spring from the branches with any sign of belonging to them, and the branches themselves ramify in a purposeless, wavy manner, without any indication of tree growth or structure. The tall buildings of the mediæval city—among them the choir of Frankfort cathedral—which are seen above the garden wall, though they do not compare in execution with the magnificent painting of the very same kind of accessories in Baron Ley's "Minstrel," which was at Knoedler's in the spring, are interesting and picturesque. The wrought iron structure supporting the wheel of the well-rope, and making a sort of canopy for the well, is delightful, a capital design, and capitally painted, in our opinion the most valuable thing in the picture. The costume is a wonder of careful painting, the drapery skilfully yet naturally arranged and elaborately studied—the pattern around Margaret's skirt is carried in and out of the folds with untiring patience and thought. The face of Faust (said, though on no authority that we can trace, to be a portrait of the artist) is admirably painted, and goes far to redeem a very ill-drawn body. The numerous faults of the picture are so mingled with its excellences as to baffle judgment of the artist's power, though the conclusion, even from this work alone, is inevitable that trees and man are not so badly drawn because the painter could do no better. We repeat, the picture is not a good specimen of the artist's work.

At the same gallery are several other pictures, each of them worthy of a more extended examination than we can give them. Riefstahl's "Sunday Afternoon in the Island of Rugen" is a delightful picture. A wide stretch of sandy barren, rolling in hillocks covered with scrubby bushes, a congregation gathered in the hollow between two hillocks, and on the slope of one of them, looking and listening to the preacher, who stands half-way up on the other; belated members of the open-air company converging to the place of meeting, and the still sea beyond. The variety of character in the weather-beaten men and women of the congregation is wonderful. It is very seldom that a picture comes to us from abroad so instructive to the unprofessional student. This is a valuable historical painting, and very nearly what we need most by way of information from abroad.

Mr. I. B. Irving's "Musical Monk" is what a number of pictures by Mr. Leutze and others pretend to be—good painting of carved cabinets and chairs, parchment-covered folios, decorated beer-mugs, chased and enamelled wine-jars, green parrots, and such worldly vanities as they. The monk himself, a very real and very rubicund Dominican, may very likely be a portrait of some old gentleman of the white frock in Bruges, or Ghent, for just such monks do yet abide in Belgium. He must be a prior or sub-abbot, at least, to have such costly surroundings. The picture is too crowded. Every possible belonging of the worldly old ecclesiastic is brought into the small canvass, and this gives the whole picture a look of the manufactured article which repels the judicious. But it is worth looking at and studying, and gives us hope of better things to come from this painter, whose name this picture first makes known to us.

Mr. Griswold's "Winter Morning" is also on exhibition at the same place. We spoke of it in reviewing the exhibition of the Academy of Design last summer. It loses nothing of its excellence on a second view.

"The Republican Court in the Time of Washington, or Mrs. Washington's Reception Day," is the title or titles of a picture by Mr. Daniel Huntington, P.N.A., which is now on exhibition in the building No. 625 Broadway. It is not, it seems, a new picture, for the engraving which is advertised, and for which subscriptions are solicited, is announced as having been "in progress of execution during the past four years."

The picture represents a large drawing-room, in which are assembled sixty-four ladies and gentlemen; an arch in the background opens into another drawing-room beyond. Each of the sixty-four figures is intended as a portrait. A pamphlet is for sale containing a numbered key to the portraits, and an account of the several personages after the fashion of a biographical dictionary. There is, therefore, no excuse for mistakes as to the meaning of the picture. Mrs. Washington stands on the left of the picture, on a platform which is raised one step above the floor, and on her right hand, also on the platform, are Mrs. Robert Morris and "Nelly Custis." President Washington is apparently about to present Miss Harriet Chew to Mrs. Washington. Behind these two persons are seen the head and shoulders of the Duke of Kent (the father of Queen Victoria), and near him the Duke of Orleans (afterwards Louis Philippe, king of the French). The pamphlet says, innocently, that "the Duke of Kent could not have met the Duke of Orleans in Philadelphia." Gen. Greene stands near, and the pamphlet, after calling him "one of the strong figures of the Revolution," owns that he "had died shortly before this period."

These volunteered admissions lead us to enquire what rank as a historical work this picture is entitled to; and, at the same time, relieve the enquirer from the duty of hunting up authorities as to dates and names. It seems that accuracy of historical statement was not intended at all. The rooms are not vouched for; indeed, President Washington's parlors at Philadelphia could hardly have been like these; the portraits on the walls, and the strange bust on a stranger substructure (is it a stove?), have no one to answer for them; some of the principal characters could not have been there, it seems; and there is little doubt that investigation would show that many other personages of the sixty-four are out of place in this gathering. Now, let the reader think how pleasant and instructive it would be to have as perfect a reproduction as is possible of Washington's drawing-room as it really was, or as perfect a conception as possible of what it might have been. That would be historical art. This picture, let it be confessed, does not pretend to be historical art, it pretends to be portraiture only. Says the pamphlet, "The artist's purpose was to represent in one frame the principal statesmen and belles who formed the Republican Court in Washington's second term." Very well, then, let no future advertisement of the engraving speak of it as a historical picture, for that it is not; it is a crowd of miniatures. The reader will see in print-shop windows a photographic picture which represents a crowd of heads of generals, another of statesmen, etc.; these are made by cutting out the heads of small portrait photographs, pasting them on a card, and taking a new photograph of the whole. Mr. Huntington's is, as historical art, precisely on a par with those "popular" works; as portraiture, it is necessarily of but little value as compared with them. And we must wait for our historical picture of Washington's "Court," thinking how pleasant it would be to have one. In the meantime, we think, looking at this picture and at the photographs of which we have spoken, how much better it would be to have the portraits separate, in miniatures or on cards.

When a picture is lighted by gas, it is impossible to judge of it aright as a work of color. The inference is natural that it is not intended that we should judge of it as a work of color. In the case before us the lighting is so bad—at once insufficient, flickering, and so wrongly placed that the looker cannot in any position escape a flash on some part of the canvass—that any judgment of the picture as a work of art is very difficult. A careful examination reveals to the looker who is armed with an opera-glass many curious ways of misdrawing the figure, much curious posing of people in incredible attitudes, and much gesticulation like that of the chorus at the opera. Two gentlemen are seen to be clad in dressing-gowns—Jonathan Trumbull's, at least, can be nothing else, and Charles Carroll's garment, which is faced with fur, may be a pelisse or a wrap-all. Chief-Justice Jay appears in his robe of office; Bishop White in full canonicals; the other personages are all, we believe, in evening dress, and variety is pleasant. But we must not return to the historical question—it is no matter whether Bishop White really did wear a black gown, or the Chief-Justice a red robe, to the President's receptions. Keeping to the question of the picture's merit as a work of art, we cannot doubt that the color is very bad indeed, for there is great display of bright-colored satins and velvets, with no brilliancy gained for the picture thereby. The flesh shadows, moreover, are cold and harsh. It is impossible to suspend judgment; we must believe the color bad until a daylight examination, if any be allowed, shall show it to be good.

We notice one merit in this picture, rare in American, or, indeed, in modern pictures; the architecture is really well designed. It is not faultless in detail, but its general forms are really very good Corinthian, and graceful enough in design.

II.—SCULPTURE.

A portrait bust of the Reverend Orville Dewey, D.D., is on exhibition at Mr. Schaus' gallery. The artist is Mr. J. Q. A. Ward. The likeness seems to be excellent. It is now a year since we saw Dr. Dewey without his hat, but it is only a few weeks since we saw him in the street; moreover, the strongly-marked face is not to be easily forgotten, and the shape and setting on of the head are unusual and attract notice. Subject, then, to correction by the Doctor's family or more intimate friends, we are ready to pronounce this an exceedingly good likeness.

Expression is the delight of people who look at portraits: "just his expression" is the best praise they can give. The intimate friends of a person are acknowledged to be the best judges of portraits of him, because they are familiar with his expression. But the expression of a man in his moments of entire repose, when his face shows no sign of strong emotion of any sort, when the traces of old emotions only are there, when no one wave of thought or passion rises higher than another, this is the only expression that can be cut in marble. The absurdity of the embodiments in marble of Faith, Repentance, Resignation, and the rest, would be exceeded by the irrational attempt to give any trace of passing emotion in such a portrait as this before us. The absence, then, from this face we are considering, of any evidence of effort to represent expression, is one of the best characteristics of this very admirable bust. Expression, such as the marble can give, the enduring signs of thought and strife, are in the features and expressed by them in the r quietest repose. The eloquent divine is not to be disguised by any calmness of his face; the sculptor takes the features in their most perfect repose, and in them finds the man and his past life. It is a great pleasure to us to see no tricks and no devices resorted to for effect. Form only is represented, and form is truly represented. Every one knows American statues in which the eyelids are deeply undercut, for shadow,—the pupil of the eye raised in relief, for effect,—the hair defined in threads, for exciting the popular admiration of dexterity,—the surface worked down with sand-paper and pumice-stone, to get the look of flesh. It is a pleasure to see none of these things. The treatment of the hair is just what it should be, its masses shown and left in solid marble locks. The surface is as it should be, cut to its right form and filed smooth, and left so.

No better portrait in marble has been made in America, so far as we know. In the corner of Mr. Schaus' somewhat crowded little gallery it will be passed by the hundreds who do not know Doctor Dewey, nor care for portraits of people they do not know. But, rare as good portraits on canvass are, they are not more common in marble, and this one will help to give Mr. Ward a high rank among modern sculptors. We congratulate the owner, whoever he is.

THE OPERA.

THE musical season really opened with the opera, although Miss Parepa appeared a week or so in advance, in a series of concerts in which she gave the people of New York abundant proof that her European fame was by no means without foundation. Her voice is fresh, powerful, and flexible, and she executes the most brilliant fiorituras with great beauty. She has by far the finest voice off of the stage, and in many respects she is superior to any singer in Mr. Maretzek's troupe. She will be here again this winter, when we can judge her better, and when, we hope, we shall hear her in oratorio, where she gained her best reputation in England.

Mr. Maretzek has a stronger company than he has had for many years, though far better in male than in female voices. Irfre, Mazzoleni, Massimiliani, Marra, Bellini, and Antonucci, with the addition of Rovere, are enough to cast thoroughly any opera, and with such a force we ought to be indulged with a sufficiency of Meyerbeer's works, which always require an abundance of male voices. Irfre has an excellent, pure, sweet voice, resembling somewhat Brignoli's in quality, and he is a much better actor. He has a more delicate appreciation of the fine shadings of his parts than Mazzoleni, who is too vigorous and coarse. Marra, who made his début as Charles V. in "Ernani," has also a clear voice, with good range, but with a little hardness. He seemed to exert himself rather more than was necessary, and though by no means a bad actor, he had little of the prince about him. Antonucci is a powerful and vigorous basso, firmer and more decided than Susini, and with a good delivery. His manner inclines to the grave, and in a solemn, earnest part he is what we have hitherto wanted. He has little of the diabolic about him, and was rather out of place as Mephistopheles.

The ladies were all known to the public, except Bosisio. She made her first appearaece in Ione, to which character she is quite well suited by her youth and beauty. She suffered from stage-fright, and until late in the evening was unable to let her voice out, and do full justice to herself. The audience were, as usual, complacent and sympathizing, and before the singer had recovered her self-possession she found them quite ready to applaud her efforts. In the last act she showed that she had the capabilities of a fine singer and of a good actress. She has been trained, however, in a bad school, and needs some severe study yet to make her a true artist. If she were to abandon Petrella and Verdi altogether, and exercise herself awhile in the calm and more quiet style of the German or old Italian masters, she would really excel. She, nevertheless, will be a favorite here—for when did youth and beauty fail to be?—if her voice does not wear out from the too great strains it is likely to undergo.

Miss Philips returns to the stage, after too long an absence. Her voice does not seem as rich as it did once, and more than ever is to be perceived a certain straining in her singing, a difficulty, as it were, in the utterance of her voice, though when it is once out it is full and round.

The season opened with the justly popular and beautiful "Faust," followed by "Poliuto" and "Lucrezia." On Monday and Tuesday of last week two very large and enthusiastic audiences assembled to hear "Ione." It is difficult to analyze the reason of the popularity of this opera. The composer, Petrella, is almost unknown, and his writings are equally so. "Ione," however, has steadily gained in the favor of the opera public here since it was first produced two or three years ago. It is written in the popular Italian style, which follows Verdi as a master, and exhibits all of his defects and few of his merits. Melody, action, and expression are all overstrained, and there is nothing if not exaggeration. The passion is too passionate, the delirium too wild, the grief too hysterical, to admit of any quiet beauty or any great grace of melody. All is excitement. The voices are strained to their highest pitch; the accompaniment is managed so as almost to drown the voice; and the action is wilder than either. The opera, though poor in idea, contains some pleasing airs and many hurried snatches of melody. Of good ringing choruses there are none. The market chorus at the beginning of the third act is the best, but that is weak, insipid, and not particularly inspiriting. There is no character to the music of the various parts. There is no special reason why one air should be sung by Ione rather than by Nydia or Glauco, were it transposed to suit their voices. This is particularly noticeable in the dialogues, where sometimes the music is not even phrased to suit the different performers, and where there certainly are no delicate shadings of meaning. This will answer very well for a work that is written for the music simply, and is not intended to convey the story to the ear, and where the drama is only a convenient vehicle to get the music to the audience. In such an opera there would be no need of words at all, as disconnected syllables would serve the purpose, though perhaps the audience might object. But that is not the true idea of an opera, which is the highest manifestation of music and the drama combined. As such it must bring into play every art that it can, and must show every varying emotion that is susceptible of musical treatment. But "Ione" contains one really fine air, snatches and reminiscences of which are heard throughout the opera, and there are many fine dramatic situations, which are treated sometimes with considerable skill. The story is interesting, and there are abundant opportunities for fine scenery. In this respect the management of the Academy owes some sort of an apology to the public. The appointments, the other night, were shocking. There seems to be no furniture in the Academy except one or two old tables, a few chairs, and a lounge; and these are brought out on every occasion, no matter how rich furniture is called for by the play. A few drop-scenes and some worn-out flats constitute the other appurtenances. Whatever may be the case with regard to Nineveh and Early Britain, all people have some idea how Pompeii looked, and are unwilling to look at a Gothic room and imagine it an antique saloon. A Pompeian interior is so easily represented, that there is no excuse for giving Ione's house in the manner it has always been given at the Academy. No one, we venture to say, except the manager, supposes that the public square of Pompeii in any wise resembled a north German town of the present century, with Gothic buildings, and red-tiled steep roofs mingled with Renaissance spires and cupolas. The costumes, too, are another cause of complaint. We cannot expect to see the chorus always well equipped from, at best, a limited treasury, but we do think we should see the principal characters wear dresses that are somewhat suited to the times they are supposed to live in. They usually wear rich enough dresses, but too often very inappropriate. The cloak that Mazzoleni wore in "Ione" is neither Greek nor Roman, and we think that no one who merely saw the stage the other night would have any very definite idea of either the time or the place of the action.

On Wednesday "Ernani" was given. It is not often that an opera is performed here with such an harmonious and so creditable a cast. The performers all acted well and carefully, and sang their parts better than is usual. Apart from qualities of voice, it would be difficult to give pre-eminence to any one of the four chief characters. Zucchi did her best. She sang much more clearly and evenly than before this season. Her voice held on to the notes well, and she did not trill and quaver as much as is her wont on the sustained passages. In "Ernani involami," she was not altogether good, her voice growing hard and unmusical as it strained upon the upper notes. Her next aria, "Tutto sprezzo," she delivered with great beauty of expression, although her voice was occasionally drowned by the orchestra. Her acting throughout was very spirited and quite correct. Antonucci made a very favorable impression as Silva. His rendering of "Infelice, e tu credevi" was the finest thing of the whole evening. Earnest, grave, and sustained, he sang with dignity and sorrow, and did not give himself up to the temptation to undue loudness or passion. Irfre and Marra both did well, though the latter fell off somewhat toward the close. With the exception of the chorus, this opera was better acted than any previous one. The men never seem to learn that it is customary to uncover before a sovereign, and that no one but grandees of the highest rank wear hats in the presence of the Spanish king.

Verdi's music is well suited to Victor Hugo's dramas, as they have many points in common. Both are sensational and exaggerated. "Ernani" belongs to Verdi's earlier manner, when he composed almost entirely in the blood-and-thunder style, and is of his best works at that period. His faults of orchestration and accompaniment, his way of massing brass and wind instruments against violins, and playing them off against each other, are very visible here. There is, however, great power of vocalization shown, and considerable wealth of melody. It is full of brief airs, with short rhythms, which are pleasing to the public because they are vigorous and ardent. The music is better in character than Petrella's, but comes far short of perfection. "Ernani" is not as good an opera as "Trovatore," "Traviata," or "Il Ballo in Maschera," but is much less hackneyed and worn out by repetition, and so we hope that it will be given oftener this winter. If we must hear Verdi, and we are always doomed to half a season of him, let us have something that is a little fresher than what we are accustomed to. It is natural that his music should be popular, for it is suited to our unrest, as it was to Italian political excitement, and those who go to hear operas are too immersed in business and pleasure to consider whether they are getting the best kind of enjoyment, or to ask themselves if the effect of the music on them is the best, as long as they enjoy the hours while they hear it.

The music of "Il Ballo in Maschera" differs in many respects from that of Verdi's previous operas. He has endeavored to change his peculiar style for one less abrupt and violent, and more sustained and with greater variety of effect. The orchestration is of a much better quality than that which marks "Ernani" or "Il Trovatore." The wind instruments do not present the same violent contrast to the strings, and the brasses are less loud and interfere less with the sentiment of the drama. They are connected together by intermediate gradations, and tell a calmer tale. The accompaniment to 'O dolcezze perdute" is an evidence of this, which is two flutes delicately combined with a harp. The trio in the second act is well conceived, where, while the soprano develops a beautiful ascending phrase, the contralto and tenor fill in the harmony, each preserving its own aim and character. Still better is the quintuor in the same act, more dramatic and better carried out than even the famous quatuor in "Rigoletto." But one of the most marked signs of a changed manner is the character of the page's music, nothing like which exists in any of Verdi's previous operas. The light gracefulness of this part attracts every one, and impresses them with its freshness and beauty. While this opera shows so much progress in the right direction, and is very beautiful in parts, it is yet not successful as a whole. All the inference that can be drawn is that Verdi can write a very good melodrama, but is unable to compose a fine tragedy. The composer was exceedingly unfortunate in his libretto. The story, which is imitated and almost translated from Auber and Scribe's "Gustave," had for its subject the assassination of Gustavus III. of Sweden. The opera was destined for the theatre of San Carlos at Naples, but was forbidden by the censors, and was then taken to Rome, where it appeared in the carnival of 1859. To obtain the approval of the Roman authorities, Verdi was compelled to mutilate it by changing somewhat the incidents, and transferring the scene to Boston, and the hero to some mythical governor of that city. The plot so altered makes the story so absurd that criticism on the manner in which the opera is put upon the stage is entirely out of place.

The performance last Friday was not so good as it might have been. Carozzi Zucchi did not seem to be much interested in her part, and gave it often rather carelessly. She was not in good voice, and acted with less feeling than usual. Mazzoleni and Bellini were both hoarse, though the latter gave "O dolcezze perdute" with great tenderness of expression. By far the best feature of the evening was Bosisio's singing. This young actress, though she had to contend against the vivid recollection of Miss Hinckley, did excellently. Her rendering left nothing to be desired. She was justly encored in "volta la terra," and sang "saper vorreste" with a grace and abandon that won every one, and increased the extremely favorable impression that she made in Ione. The house was not full, and did not seem in a mood to appreciate the music. There was little applause and few encores. The chief singers came before the curtain at the close, apparently from habit, and without any special desire on the part of the audience.

From the great success of this Company they are enabled to offer superior advantages to policy-holders.

Life policies are issued, payable in annual, or in one, five, or ten annual instalments; also non-forfeiture endowment policies, payable in ten annual payments, which are paid at death, or on arriving at any particular age. Life insurance, as an investment, has no superior, as it has saved millions of dollars to the insured, and thousands of families from ruin. Dividends are paid to policy-holders, thus enabling them to continue their policies, if otherwise unable to do so.

This favorable feature has been the means of saving many policies that would have been forfeited for want of means to continue them, and, in several instances, families once wealthy have thus been saved from utter ruin.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

SATURDAY, A.M.

THE Secretary of the Treasury caused to be published, on Monday last, an official statement of the public debt of the United States, as it stood on the 30th of September. The figures gave much satisfaction to the public, as showing not only a reduced total of indebtedness, but an inclination to curtailment in the volume of legal tender paper money. It also afforded evidence that the finances of the Government, within less than five months after the close of our great and expensive war, have become self-supporting—that the resources of taxation and customs are found equal to the current expenditures of the Government. No such result could have been anticipated so soon after the termination of hostilities. The previous belief was general that we could not settle up the war debt, and disband and pay off our great armies, and reduce our navy, under a total figure of three thousand millions of dollars. This, indeed, was rather a minimum estimate. The maximum predicted by the peculiar class of patriots known as croakers (both since the war, and in the midst of the terrible struggle) was not less than four thousand millions.

The publication of the above statement of the public debt was followed, on Monday afternoon, with a proposition from the Treasury Department to withdraw from circulation $50,000,000 (fifty millions) of interest-bearing legal tender notes by an exchange for United States gold-bearing 5-20s, at the rate of 103 per cent., full interest being allowed to the 17th November on the notes so exchanged or funded. The first impression in Wall Street and on the Stock Exchange, in regard to this proposal, was that it would rather tighten the money market by tempting out of circulation and out of the legal tender reserve of the banks the fifty millions sought to be funded on such favorable terms to the holders. But, thus far, no such effect has followed, although the banks at once notified about ten millions for immediate conversion. The money market continued in the same easy and cheap condition as before until Thursday, when the rates of interest were advanced by the demands of an upward speculation in railway shares at the Stock Exchange. The brokers are now paying 6 to 7 per cent. for money lent subject to call, in place of 5 to 6 per cent. as before.

The speculation referred to has been unusually violent, accompanied with wide fluctuations in prices for several days past, but without extending to Government stocks or advancing other securities outside the regular list of railway and miscellaneous shares.

The price of gold has been advanced about 3 per cent., advantage being taken in the Gold Room of the visit of the Secretary of the Treasury to the West, and the supposed absence of discretionary authority with other officials, in the meantime, to continue the sales of gold in the open market. We doubt whether this last calculation is well based, but there is no question that the large daily receipts in gold for customs must either impose the necessity for further Government sales, or else advance the price of gold from this absorption at the Treasury. It is found that the prepayments of the November gold interest are too gradual to qualify the continued large demand to pay into the Treasury for customs, which this week amounts to $3,500,000.

The trade of the past week has been moderately active in dry goods, and large in general merchandise and in the cotton line. The latest Liverpool advices have advanced the price of cotton to 50 to 52 cents the pound, and purchases for export are understood to be on an extensive scale. The receipts at this port the present week are 25,000 bales; the stock unsold about 125,000 bales; and the stock in the Southern ports, at last mail dates, fully 175,000 bales.

The foreign trade and customs duties, for the first quarter of the current fiscal year—July 1 to September 30, inclusive—at the port of New York, two months officially reported, and September in part estimated, show that the gold value of about seventy-two millions foreign goods has been marketed, and thirty-six millions customs duties paid upon them into the United States Treasury in gold. Estimating from the proportion of last year that New York transacts 72 per cent. of the whole import business of the country, the Government must have received fifty millions in gold customs for the first quarter, while the consumption of foreign goods for the same term is to the value of one hundred millions.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, is pursuing a journey through the South. His letters appear every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

NATIONAL LIFE

AND

OF NEW YORK.

THE advertisement of this admirable Company appears in another part of our paper, where its great advantages may be seen more in detail. It possesses all the characteristics of a benevolent institution, with this one loftier feature: its funds are reserved for distribution amongst the prudent—amongst those who, in the hour of health and vigor, will effect an insurance against such casualties as may befal them in another hour. Thus a person who travels may insure himself against steamboat or railroad accident; and he who labors for his bread may, by the payment of premiums so small as to be within the reach of every citizen, make a provision against the pecuniary distress that frequently follows those accidents of the work shop which are of daily occurrence. It repays to the contributor a hundred-fold more than it receives from him, and this princely repayment is effected at a period when the insurant is prostrate upon a bed of helplessness and suffering. It is quite impossible to over-estimate such an object; and in reference to the gentlemen connected with the Company, we need but quote the following from the Insurance Journal and Real Estate Gazette, a paper of high standing in the Insurance interest:

"The Directors of the Company are unexceptionable. The President, Mr. EDWARD A. JONES, is a gentleman of great talent and energy, and accomplished in insurance matters. He graduated from the Manhattan Life Insurance Company, of which institution he was the General Agent. The Secretary, Mr. ASHER S. MILLS, graduated from the Mutual Life Insurance Company, where he was for a number of years chief book-keeper, and the knowledge and experience he gained in that important position will greatly assist in the management of this Company. Under the supervision of such able guardians, and with such an ample field for operation, this Company will soon rank with the most prosperous, as it certainly does among the most useful, of the States."

CRUSHERS AND PULVERIZERS,

FOR WET OR DRY WORKING,

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

105 STATE STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

Miners should not purchase machinery before seeing, or sending their friends to examine, the practical working of this series of machinery.

☞ The Whirling Table, or Crusher, weighs less than two tons, and crushes from ten to twelve tons of ore per hour to fine gravel, or two hundred and fifty tons in twenty-four hours.

The Pulverizer weighs two tons, and pulverizes to dust, infinitely finer than stamp work, one ton of ore per hour, or twenty-four tons per diem, equal to the yield of twenty-five or thirty stamps; and the first cost and wear, as compared to this number of stamps, is about one-tenth;—the entire yield being fit for amalgamation without further reduction. The fine dust is not obtained by screening, but by the immediate action of the Pulverizer.

Fifteen horse-power, net, is the maximum power required for one machine.

The cost of the wear, per ton, is less than by any other machine. All wearing parts are now made of Franklinite iron.

Let miners and their friends carefully study the practical working of all other machines and processes offered, and then see ours working in East Boston, Mass. We ask only this.

All of our machines are now made in our own shop. No CONTRACT WORK.

The Week.

THE tone of the week has been political chiefly. The fall elections have begun, and the results of those at the North are in every way gratifying. On Tuesday, the 10th, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Iowa went up to the polls. The majorities are, in round numbers, 25,000, 25,000, and 20,000 respectively, with the odds all upwards instead of the other way. In Pennsylvania, at least, as could not fail to be observed, the issue was really negro suffrage, since, however much it was declined by the Union party, the Democrats affirmed it to be the only question, and made what capital they could of it. So in Philadelphia, Morton McMichael was chosen mayor, to be sure by a reduced majority, yet against a rival who took pains to announce that he considered the admission of colored people into the street cars the first step toward all the horrors of negro equality. So we hope that the city virtually decided in favor of abolishing the present disgraceful treatment of an unoffending portion of its citizens. We hope not less strongly that Newark spoke for a purified and restored New Jersey when, on the same day with these great freedom-loving States, it reversed the rule under which it has labored for half a dozen years, and discovered a Union majority that seems destined for long life and power. The Virginia election on the 12th was orderly. What are called "eligible" candidates, that is, those who will not certainly be debarred from Congress by the test oath, were returned from most of the districts. The constitutional amendment, by which those who prominently participated in the rebellion are restored to the privilege of holding office, was, of course, "adopted by an almost unanimous vote." Gen. Humphreys' majority for governor of Mississippi amounts to 10,000, and his pardon has been sent him, though his very nomination was in defiance of the professed policy of the Government to exclude the disloyal from a return to public trust and station. The successful candidate for the court of appeals is an avowed opponent of negro testimony.

THE President's address to the colored regiment of the District on the 10th relieves him of the odium of being the willing leader of the "white man's party." He told his hearers and the race which they represented that they were not alien, but to the manor born, and he hoped that the capacity of our institutions for the assimilation of every human element would not be exceeded in their case, and that they would remain "a harmonious and permanent ingredient in the population." He called them his countrymen, complimented them for their services in the war for the national existence, and exhorted them to industry and education from the text that "liberty consists in the glorious privilege of work." The suffrage was not alluded to, but was an inevitable inference from the results proposed—one of which, to the horror of his Democratic admirers, was the making white men black, and black men white, with the recipe gratis.

THE correspondence between Grant and Sherman, which made its appearance last week, does great honor to both parties, and above all to Grant. His simple and honest soul never appeared to better advantage than in the few touching and manly lines in which he expresses his obligations to his two distinguished lieutenants. His English, too, is a marvel of directness and clearness. In this he has a great advantage over Sherman, whose more erratic genius leads him sometimes, when he gets his pen in his hand, to take little rhetorical flights which do not add to his reputation, and from which he occasionally comes down with a disagreeable flop. Whenever the history of the war comes to be written, there will certainly be nothing to record more creditable, not only to the men themselves, but to the age and society in which they were bred, than the relations which prevailed from first to last between the two greatest soldiers of the struggle.

THE colored people of Raleigh, who met in convention on the 29th ult., and drew up a petition to the Constitutional Convention and the Legislature which succeeds it, cannot be accused of having asked for more than they ought reasonably to expect. They set forth in simple and touching language the fact of their great transition from servitude to freedom, and their devout acknowledgments to the Creator for his merciful interposition. They admit the inevitable helplessness of their present condition, their inability to control legislation in their behalf, and their utter dependence "upon moral appeal to the hearts and consciences of the people" of North Carolina. Anticipating the not distant removal of Government protection, they pray these representative bodies —in the face of actual hardships from the avarice, perfidy, and inhumanity of many of their employers, formerly their masters—to enable them to work with assurance of good faith and fair treatment, to educate their children, to sanctify the family relation, to reunite scattered families, and to provide for the orphan and infirm. Such are their modest demands. Their only assertion is, that, loving the land and its people more than ever before, they mean to remain there unless forcibly expatriated.

IF our notion of the state of Massachusetts politics is correct, it appears that Gen. Banks is domiciled wherever he pleases—whether now a citizen of Illinois, now of Louisiana, or now, as in the beginning, of Massachusetts. At any rate, spite of the elaborate arguments to prove his non-eligibility to office, he has been nominated by the Republicans to Congress from the Sixth District, and of course will win his seat, to the chagrin of those who argued as aforesaid. Time will show which party was the wiser. Meanwhile it is matter of congratulation that the candidate has committed himself to such sentiments as these:

"I am in favor of granting the right of suffrage to colored men. I believe this measure to be necessary to the settlement of the affairs of this country, and have full confidence that it will be adopted. I urged this upon the Constitutional Convention of Louisiana in 1864, and in an address I delivered in New Orleans the 4th of July of this year."

There is something to be augured for the cause of equal rights when it is espoused by a man who always knows on which side his bread is buttered.

In reply to the South Carolina delegation which came on to solicit the pardon of Jefferson Davis, the President said, according to a brief and perhaps imperfect report of the Tribune, that "sometimes the peculiar locality had much to do with pardons," that "all could not be pardoned at once;" "the thing would have to be done gradually;" that "he would rather pardon twenty men than refuse one;" that "if treason was committed there ought to be some test to determine the power of the Government to punish the crime;" that "there should be a vindication of the Government and the Constitution, even if the pardoning power were exercised thereafter," and many other things equally luminous. We must confess our inability to interpret them with anything like confidence. As well as we can make out, however, the meaning of all this is that somebody will be tried for treason; that probably it will be Jefferson Davis; that all, however, will be pardoned, but gradually, little by little, to avoid shocks to the nervous system; that pardoning is a difficult art, and needs skill; and that the President is a merciful man, and likes pardoning, and that pardons have some occult relation with localities. We give this gloss for what it is worth.

Two measures looking to the peace establishment were promulgated on the 12th—a proclamation of the President revoking that of the 5th of July, 1865, which subjected Kentucky to martial law; and an order from Gen. Grant which reveals the policy of Government in regard to its standing army. This body, as was commonly expected, will be composed exclusively of the regular troops, both white and colored. The remaining volunteer regiments are to be mustered out as soon as practicable, and the others are already being assigned to various posts and forts throughout the country. Of course, colored garrisons will be kept only at the South.

They have set about procuring an equestrian statue of Col. Shaw for the adornment of the State House yard in Boston. We object to the site. If the work be botched, it will make three bad bronzes in one enclosure; and if it were as good as it ought to be, it would be out of place. The effigy would feel as uncomfortable between Mann and Webster as the prisoner who halted on the Bridge of Sighs betwixt the palace and the prison. The Webster statue is not to be over-ridden in this fashion. So let us see the monument planted on the Common—as yet devoid of art—or on Commonwealth Avenue, if that is preferred, along with Alexander Hamilton, set up by Mr. Lee's munificence.

Gov. Andrew, whom rumor would have appointed to the head of Antioch College, has accepted a very different presidency, of which it would be idle to disparage the usefulness. He has been secured by the American Land Company and Emigration Agency, whose object will be the development of the resources of the West and South, and which, from its financial constitution, seems likely to exercise a potent influence on the regeneration of the emancipated States. Col. Frank E. Howe is the vice-president and resident general manager in this city. Gov. Andrew will continue to make his home in Boston.

The war-drain has not prevented Wisconsin from increasing in population during the last five years. On the 1st of June, 1865, she reckoned 868,847 inhabitants against 775,620 in 1860; or, a gain of 93,227. She hopes for a million by the next census. The State treasury has disbursed $2,478,792 as extra pay to volunteers with families, and the contributions to the Sanitary, Christian, and other commissions have corresponded to those of other States. But, besides these outlays, the amount raised by towns and counties for sustaining the war, or mitigating the hardships of those left at home without adequate support, has been almost eight millions.

The Tennessee Legislature is inclined to hold the President to his earlier, rather than his later, views of the enormity of treason. A resolution introduced into that body on the 10th, which praised the Executive policy of restoring by amnesty the returned Confederate soldiers "to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of full and complete citizenship," was tabled, and the following laconic substitute passed by a large majority:

"Resolved, That we endorse the administration of His Excellency Hon. Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, especially his declaration that treason shall be made odious and traitors punished."

The prosecution of the Street Commissioners before Gov. Fenton has failed to satisfy him of the soundness of the charges on which they were arraigned, and the case has been dismissed instead of the Board. The Comptroller is next on the docket, and to-day will have his first hearing at Albany.

Certain lights of the rebellion, to wit, John A. Campbell, of Alabama, John H. Regan, of Texas, Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, George A. Trenholm, of South Carolina, and Charles Clark, of Mississippi, having duly applied for pardon, have been remitted by the President from close custody to the freedom of their respective States, under a pledge that they will abide therein and surrender themselves to answer any charges that may be preferred against them. The belief has found expression in the Boston papers that the ex-Vice-President will devote himself to a popular inculcation of his new views pertaining to the corner-stone of American institutions, among which the right of the colored man to vote is openly confessed. If a like result is to follow the unlocking of the rest of these distinguished traitors, there will be little objection to their delivery, and certainly less disposition to summon them to account hereafter. We would not pretend to estimate precisely the value of their parole, after the experience the nation has had with that article, at a time when they thought that their necks were not imperilled by violating, as now they are likely to be by keeping, their word of honor. Yet theirs will be a venial offence if they avoid the hangman by quitting the country; and if they are at a loss to know whither to flee, we would suggest that for them ubi servitudo, ibi patria—that is, they may choose between Brazil and Cuba, for Kentucky is out of the question.

A silly forgery, contrived by the Louisville Democrat, has obtained sufficient circulation to justify an exposure. It purports to be a correspondence between Secretary Seward, the governor of Massachusetts, and "Wm. L. Garrison." The secretary transmits to the governor the amended constitution of Mississippi, to ascertain if it is satisfactory to the State "which was the only 'anti-slavery' State when the Union was formed." The governor turns it over to Mr. Garrison to "reject or ratify it" at his "earliest convenience." Mr. Garrison examines the document carefully, and deems it politic not to demand as much as would be consonant with his "ideas," which appear to be to "prepare the negroes for amalgamation or extermination, and thus close up the great work for ever." It is not so astonishing that this stuff should be concocted as that it should be reproduced, as it has been, with even a doubt as to its true character. Mr. Garrison, for the rest, never signs his name except in full.

The guerrillas of whom we still continue to hear in the Southern States are not to be regarded as the unconquerable residuum of the rebellion. They may experience their keenest satisfaction when attacking, as they did last week in Mississippi, a Government train, or abusing, perhaps unto death, and despoiling such solitary Federal officers as happen to become their prey. But neither fidelity to oath, nor principle, nor the exactions of honor, neither Southern independence nor the preservation of slavery, is the motive of their warfare: simply plunder. We gave last week a picture of some of the disorders in Alabama from an officer of the Freedmen's Bureau. We learn, from private sources, of gangs which infest the water-courses of the same State, watching for the shipment of cotton, with a view to making a prize of it on its way down stream, and boarding not only rafts, but, in the instance within our knowledge, a steamer even, and, when foiled, firing upon the escaping boat with a dexterity acquired during the past four years. We are disposed, however, to credit the statement that the honest-minded rank and file of the Confederate armies are not found engaged in this sort of piracy, whatever may be their prejudices against the freedmen. These enemies of their kind represent a class which had a necessary place in Southern society, but will not be tolerated under the new régime—the desperadoes and blacklegs who were convenient as the instruments of Lynch-law, when abolitionists were obnoxious, and who often enough were themselves deemed proper subjects for its application.

THERE has been no view advanced of the powers of the Government in reconstructing the rebellious States more radical than that of Gov. Brownlow in his address to the people of Tennessee, July 14. To quote his very words:

"It had a right to present just such a particular form of free government as was most adapted to the condition of the people, and to choose the means of setting it on foot. If it had chosen the constitution of Kentucky or of Maine, it is difficult to see what objection could have been made on constitutional grounds; but in deference to the tastes and habits of our people, it chose our own constitution, divested only of that feature which had caused all our sufferings."

This position the President is understood to reject, though he never specifically contradicted Gov. Brownlow. Gov. Hamilton has insisted in Texas that slavery and the black code were inseparable, and ceased to exist together. Gov. Marvin is teaching the same wholesome doctrine in Florida. Who would have expected to find Gov. Sharkey training in this company? Yet on the 18th of last month he wrote to Commissioner Thomas that the State Convention, which abolished the whole system of slavery, abolished, "as a matter of course, any measure or policy which grew out of that system." If distinctions of color at the polls—as well as in the courts, to which the governor's argument is directed—were not an outgrowth of slavery, we should like to be told their origin. Latest of all, a justice of the peace took away a fowling-piece from a colored citizen of Alexandria, relying upon a prohibitory statute of Virginia. The Provost-Judge and the Major-General commanding the Department of Washington have notified the mayor that neither this law nor that which forbids colored people to be found on the streets after 10 P.M., under pain of arrest, will be enforced hereafter, and that the blacks and whites are to rest upon the same footing in respect of the rights of property and the freedom of their persons. We naturally enquire why the Executive, which either directly or through its subordinates says A, is reluctant and too scrupulous to say B? what greater violence is done to the majesty of the Southern States by making men equal before the jury-box than before the ballot-box? and what is the constitutional excuse which will cover one case and not the other?

PRESIDENT JOHNSON is the kindest of public men, and as sure of winning a high character for clemency as Julius Cæsar was when he pardoned everybody—and we hope the parallel will not hold good by his fall from blows delivered by the hands of his new friends, the enemy. The latest instance of his magnanimity is that afforded by the pardon of Gen. Humphreys. The general was a stout rebel, who had not been admitted to grace, and therefore was not qualified for office; but the chivalrous Mississippians, who care little for "the world, or the world's law," nominated him for the office of governor of their State, and elected him by a large majority. The President, to "make things square all round," instantly qualified the general by pardoning him, an answer to the defiance that he had received from the gallant repudiators for which, we must confess, we were not quite prepared. Really, when they saw what was the effect of their bold action, the Mississippians must have been vexed at the thought they did not nominate that suffering saint, Mr. Jefferson Davis, for the post of chief magistrate of their State. Had they but thought so to do, that eminent personage would have been in Mississippi at this time, helping to reconstruct that State—that is, if the course pursued in the case of Humphreys indicates the line that is to govern the President; and surely, as there can be no accessories in the crime of treason, but all who offend in that way are principals, there ought to be no difference in the treatment of the leaders in the late rebellion. Any gentleman, therefore, who was so mistaken in his ideas as to take an effective part in the rebellion, will have to get a nomination to office merely, in a sure State, to secure the remission of his sins. Such persons as George Sanders, Beverly Tucker, Mr. Mann, Mr. Breckinridge, and others, who are shy of showing themselves on American soil, must be cheered by what they see has been done, for it opens up the way to the safe return of such worthies to a country which they did their utmost to ruin, and which they hope to help ruin hereafter, on the "better-luck-next-time" principle. They can also see that treason is not a punishable offence, and rejoice accordingly.

THERE is beginning to be a great demand at the North for freedmen, without at present an adequate supply. The employment office in Washington is satisfying its applicants to some extent, but last week it received a requisition from Michigan for four hundred railroad laborers, at eighty-seven cents per diem and board, another from Maryland, for twenty-five, and still another (mirabile!) from Connecticut for the same number. Dr. Reyburn, chief medical officer of the Bureau for the District of Columbia and a part of Virginia, reports about 6,000 freedmen in Loudon County who are entirely self-supporting. Fairfax County has 3,000, with only twenty-five dependent on the Government. There are 8,000 in Alexandria, a large number of whom are now idle on account of the reduction in the force of the employees for the various departments of the army. The hospital has a few patients. Schools are numerous and flourishing, with a large attendance of adults and children. The mayors of Washington and Alexandria have signified their willingness to take charge of all poor colored people who were residents before the war. The number of sick and destitute who received rations last month in the District was 824, in a total freed population of 34,308. Two soup-houses, at the capital, established some time since, are feeding three hundred people daily.

Gen. Swayne informs the Bureau that the Alabama authorities last winter supplied 139,000 white persons with meal and salt for their subsistence. Some provision will have to be made by the general Government for this class, in order to prevent a great deal of misery and even actual starvation. A drought which has prevailed from the middle of July up to this date has destroyed three-fourths of the entire crop of the State, which has as little money as food. The freedmen's schools at Montgomery return 285, those at Mobile 631, scholars. Among the four hundred cases requiring medical treatment about one-tenth were of small-pox.

A normal school has been opened at Charleston with several hundred colored pupils. In Gen. Saxton's district there are a hundred and twenty teachers.

Gen. Fisk has broken up all the freedmen's camps and "homes" in his district, with the exception of Camp Nelson in Kentucky, and the inmates of that asylum are being rapidly distributed over the State. Those who have been thus dispersed have been mainly established in good homes in the country. The exodus from crowded cities and towns to farms has been large. "County and municipal authorities are required to provide for their own poor, care for their own sick, and bury their own dead." On the 2d of September, 979 persons were subsisted by Government in Tennessee: not one is a burden to-day.

Gen. Gregory has arrived in Texas, and established his headquarters at Houston.

Gen. Howard addressed the members of the North Carolina convention, and a numerous assemblage of the citizens of Raleigh, at the Capitol, on the evening of Thursday the 12th. He was on his way to South Carolina, in conformity with an order from the President, to bring about an amicable arrangement, if possible, between the blacks who were planted by Gen. Sherman on the islands and river plantations and the former owners of the property thus occupied, who are "earnestly soliciting the restoration of the same, and promising to absorb the labor and care of the freedmen." Gen. Howard has plenary powers in the premises.

Circular 18 of the Freedmen's Bureau, dated Oct. 6, 1865, relates to the issuing of subsistence stores to its hospitals, which are thoroughly assimilated to those of the army.

WHATEVER may be the amount of excitement in Great Britain concerning the Fenians, the movement evidently fills a considerable place in the mind of the reporter of the associated press, to judge from the foreign news budgets for the week. Perhaps he thinks he will find appreciative readers here. Affairs have proceeded so far that the prisoners, including the editor and proprietor of The Irish People, have been brought before the police magistrates of Dublin for examination. The Queen's counsel disclosed the bloody intentions of the organization, and told of the extensive manufacture of pikes, the finding of revolvers and breast-plates, the intercepting of drafts from America, etc., etc. The Paris Constitutionnel improved its opportunity to thrust at the imperial ally across the Channel, on account of the summary suppression of the seditious print above named—"in sudden forgetfulness of the immunities of the press, without a jury trial, and manu militari," but "with that eminently practical spirit which characterizes the English, so that, promptly brushing theories and principles aside, they ran to the point in distress, struck, punished—and smothered the spark to avoid the conflagration." Far be it from us, continued this journal, to taunt a great nation with inconsistency; we only desire to remark that "the same evils call for the same remedies," and that if a temporary agitation like that in Ireland justifies such rigorous measures, absolute freedom of the press is impossible in France, where agitation is permanent. That this deduction was not relished by the liberal contemporaries of the Constitutionnel may be readily guessed, especially when they saw the article copied into the Thursday Moniteur—a number regarded as a sort of oracle. The cholera continues to make headway. Marseilles presented a novel spectacle during the nights of Sept. 19 and 20. By the advice of the physicians of the city, fires were lit in all the streets in the new as well as the ancient quarters, with the primary design of purifying the atmosphere, but with the natural effect of consuming a vast quantity of rubbish which would else have served to feed the pestilence. The scenes about these bonfires were highly animated, and the sombre thoughts of the populace were for a moment dispelled. On the 22d of last month the anniversary of the fatal émeute which attended the transfer of the capital of Italy from Turin to Florence was celebrated in the former city. By previous public arrangement a funeral service was held at the church of Gran-Madre-di-Dio, after which a procession of working-men, political societies, citizens, and others proceeded with draped banners and personal badges of mourning to the graves of the victims of the tumult. Speeches were delivered, and the programme was fully carried out; but, as the Government wisely refrained from interfering, there was no disorder. The Avanguardia, however, whose editors were prominent in the demonstration, and the Unita italiana, were seized at the post-office. No enterprise is so formidable as to discourage competition. The prospectus of "Allan's Trans-Atlantic Telegraph Company" (limited) has been published in England. The line selected is from Falmouth to Halifax, via Oporto and the Azores. For the construction of the line to Portugal the capital will be £150,000, in £10 shares. The cable used will be Allan's patent, among the advantages of which are reckoned its diminished size and weight, and the consequent ease with which it can be laid, together with a saving of one-third in the first cost, and a gain of one-half in working capacity.

The present year will probably be conspicuous for its meteorological and terrestrial phenomena, accompanied by pestilence among men and beasts. The summer season has been extraordinary on both sides of the Atlantic, and the continent of Europe, in the west and centre, has been the theatre of an unusual number of destructive tornadoes. On Sunday week San Francisco experienced its heaviest earthquake, of two main shocks, lasting half a minute, and driving the tide to its extremes of fulness and ebb. Sacramento, Stockton, San José, and Santa Cruz especially, were shaken simultaneously. As there is nothing without its uses, so this visitation will furnish data for calculating with more or less certainty its probable recurrence. This is what has been done in France by M. Fournet, in regard to the tempests of which that country has borne the brunt. From more than three thousand observations of the weather in the valley of the Saône, which cover a period of more than thirty years, he has deduced the periodicity of storms with considerable accuracy. Thus, he finds that winter is apt to be ushered in by a storm about the 2d or 3d of December, followed generally by a second on the 15th. The middle of January is marked by the quantity of rain and the flooding of the streams; and the winter goes out very often with as rude a blast as it came in. June 29th is famous for the violence of its thunder-claps. The 12th to the 18th of August is a period of constant bad weather, in spite of the Emperor's fête on the 15th; so that the "Assumption storms" are proverbial. We have only mentioned some of the leading dates, but the results of M. Fournet's investigations are so detailed that an inhabitant of the region referred to might prudently regulate his husbandry and his out-door engagements for every day of the year by them—not, surely, expecting to meet with no disappointments, but trusting in the long run to be seldom surprised to his detriment.

Petroleum is not only found in Russia, but has already attained no mean development, and promises large returns in the future. It abounds on the peninsula of Apsheron, in the Caspian, and near Lake Baikal in Siberia, and has just been discovered on the left bank of the Kuban River. It is also met in the same neighborhood on the peninsulas of Taman and Kertch, which are separated by the Straits of Enikale, the outlet of the Sea of Azov. Lastly, along the Volga, in Kasan, Simbirsk, and Samara, and even in Archangel, the oil makes its appearance. Kertch, Taman, and Apsheron have the only regular works. Four wells in the two former produced, from July, 1864, to July, 1865, nearly 200,000 litres of petroleum. In Apsheron there are 220 wells of white and black naphtha, which belong to the state, but are farmed out to private parties. The deepest wells furnish most oil. The working of them dates from an early period, but hitherto they have been of little profit. Now that refining processes are improved, and petroleum has leapt to such a rank among commercial products, new vigor will doubtless be manifested in this direction.

The invasion of France by English capital is noted as among the peaceable signs of the times. An English house has obtained the contract for constructing the railroad over Mount Cenis. It was granted only after experiments which themselves cost 500,000 francs. The capital is only eight millions, but is considered ample. A parapet separating the highway from the railway is to be built the entire distance. At certain well-known points the road is to be protected against snow-slides by a strong iron roofing.

Lamartine is writing for the Paris Constitutionnel a life of Lord Byron. He states in his preface that he had always suspected Moore's life of containing very little of the memoirs attributed to Byron himself, for burning which his friend and biographer has incurred severe reproaches. He now knows, from the person "for whom Lord Byron had no secret in his latter years," and who saw the memoirs confided to Moore, that they did not exceed a hundred pages of manuscript; and even if the handwriting had been less sprawling and careless than usual, there could not have been matter for two or three thousand pages of print. Lamartine concludes that the document consisted of notes and memoranda merely. A similar collection he found in the possession of the lady whose testimony he cites, and whose intimate acquaintance he enjoys. Other qualifications for his task he derives from having associated for many years in Florence with Captain Medwin, the first biographer of Byron, frequent meetings with Lady Blessington, and personal researches in Greece in regard to the brief campaign in which the poet perished.

There existed formerly in Paris, when her streets were not what they now are, an industrious class called gutter scavengers, whose business was particularly brisk after a heavy rain, that left uncovered small coins or pieces of metal that had a value at the junk-shops. A revival of this class has been occasioned by the extraordinary fall of the Seine, and its shoals and banks now swarm with explorers, who find much better pickings than the streets afforded. Sometimes jewels, sometimes objects precious for their antiquity alone, reward the laborious search, which is prosecuted with the greatest vigor at the outlets of the sewers. The opening chapters of "Our Mutual Friend" are said by the London Daily News to have been sketched from the life. The Thames employs many low characters in fishing for drowned bodies, which afford a revenue in one of three ways—either they are rifled and returned to the water, or are restored for a satisfactory remuneration to the friends of the deceased, or at the worst are turned over to the coroner for the sake of six shillings.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

WISE WAITING.

"TIME and I against any ten others," once said the crafty Mazarin. And it is a self-confidence not unworthy to inspire a wise statesman as well as a cunning politician. Delays are not always dangerous, nor is procrastination necessarily the thief of time, in spite of the copy-book. Quite the contrary. Inactivity is often more masterly than action, and to wait as essential to success as to labor. Especially is this the case in great political crises—at those cardinal moments on which turn the destinies of a nation. For such delays are not necessarily consumed by idleness and sloth. If wise, they are alive with thought, anxious with forecast, busy with preparation. It is the patience of the husbandman biding the timely germination and growth of his seed, while carefully providing for the harvest that is to crown his waiting. Crime demands haste as one of the conditions of its success. The wise and prudent regulation of human affairs requires patience to discover and apply the eternal law, obedience to which alone can make them permanently prosperous and happy. "Scelera impetu, bona consilia morâ valescere." The insurgent States had to be hurried into rebellion. The nation can afford to wait and well consider the conditions on which it will be safe for itself, or best for them, to receive them back into the family circle again.

Haste is the greatest danger of this most critical hour, and, as such, it is the one to be the most carefully guarded against. It is not unnatural that the President should wish to rehabilitate the States with which he is personally identified by birth and abode, and to see them again invested with the constitutional sovereignties, duly subordinated to the imperial Union, from which they had madly cast themselves down through the temptings of a wicked ambition. It is entirely in accordance with the nature of things that Democrats of the old school, who have been hungering in the cold for more than four years after the savory meat and the fat things that their souls love, should long for the joyful reconciliation which shall restore the old affiance between themselves and the South, and give them another chance to sell their birthright for a mess of pottage. And it is comprehensible that certain of the Republicans should desire to hasten the time when the republic shall enjoy the glorious revenge of showing herself to her enemies, everywhere, strengthened by her conflict with those that sought her life, established in the fulness of her sovereignty over all her broad domain, glorious in her strength, and resplendent in her beauty—the time when the little lord (whose name we have forgotten) who declared in Parliament that "the republican bubble had burst" shall be compelled to acknowledge that it has come forth unharmed, even from the cannon's mouth, and when the great lord (whose name we all remember) who averred that the republic was "fighting for empire" must admit that, if she were, at least she has won it, and means to keep it. All this can be understood, but it is all argument for wise deliberation and against headlong haste.

It is right to learn of one's enemies, and there is no safer lesson than that which teaches us to do the very opposite of what they wish. Now there is nothing that Southerners so earnestly desire, nothing that their Copperhead allies, who did all they dared to help them when in red-handed rebellion, so impudently demand, as that they should at once be restored to all the political rights of which they stripped themselves, and to their full share in the direction of the government which they had failed, after four years of murderous and treasonous struggle, to destroy. We submit that the republic would suffer no detriment from the refusal of this request on the part of those whose duty it is to see that she suffers none. We affirm, on the contrary, that she would run most danger of detriment from thus putting herself into the hands, yet red with the blood of her best and bravest, of her bitterest enemies. We are well aware that this restoration must take place some day. But that day need not be to-day, nor yet to-morrow. Some purgatorial intermediacy should surely be interposed between souls just escaped from the hell of rebellion, and the paradise of power. We hold that repentance, a repentance not to be repented of, should go before absolution and perfect pardon. We believe in the conversion of sinners, but we are slow to believe in instantaneous conversions. Let fruits meet for repentance be first brought forth, and then let the repentant prodigals be restored to the rights of sonship and brotherhood, and not before. Time is essential for this, and time every man who regards either his country's honor and prosperity, or his own, should demand at the hands of Congress, as the one essential preliminary to a final amnesty and restoration.

The condition is assuredly not a hard one. In spite of the unprovoked nature of the rebellion, of the atrocities with which it was marked, of the mourning with which it has darkened almost every hearthstone, of the mortgage it has laid on the industry of the country for long years to come, there is absolutely no demand for vengeance, and scarcely any for justice. The magnanimity of the nation towards the men who are now crouching at her feet is without example in song or story. She says to them, with a sublime clemency:

> "——Kneel not to me;
> The power that I have on you is to spare you;
> The malice towards you to forgive you. Live,
> And deal with others better!"

But the last condition must be made imperative. They must deal better with others, their neighbors, black and white, and the stranger that may be within their gates, than they have ever yet done, and it must be made assured that they shall not deal worse with ourselves, before we re-invest them with power for evil as well as for good. And time must be given them to furnish this price of mercy. One year's, two years' suspension of national political rights! What a penalty for the gigantic crime which has crushed and maimed a million lives, and filled the land with widows and with orphans! No torturing punishments, no drawing and quartering, no skull on the city gates, proclaiming with "its bleak and mouldered jaws" the doom of a traitor, no statutes gleaning the refuse of the sword—nothing but a brief suspension of political rights until good conduct has proved that they may be restored with safety to the nation!

Ought reasonable men to ask for more? Can the nation with safety be satisfied with less? The greatest boon that can be granted to the people of the South for a season is rest from turmoil and excitement, protection against each other, assistance in removing from their soil the blight with which war, superinduced upon slavery, has cursed it. The rehabilitation of industry should naturally precede that of political rights. We believe that, outside of a small body of noisy political adventurers, the great mass of the Southern people would prefer national supervision and protection, for some time to come, to being left to the tender mercies of the men who have brought their calamity upon them. But whether so or not, if truly penitent, or even content to submit in good faith to the arbitrament to which they appealed, they should be willing and rejoiced to purchase peace and safety at so cheap a rate. But let the masses, white as well as black, think as they will, the old demagogues, or rather oligarchs, are beforehand with them. They intend having a full complement of senators and representatives on foot in Washington next December, ready to take their places in the Capitol, if bullying, cajolery, or bribery can open its doors to them. It is to be feared that a voice potential, "as double as the duke's," may be uplifted in their behalf. It will require great firmness and resolution on the part of the Republican majority to resist the influences that will be exerted to make them consent to their own defeat and the triumphal entrance of the enemy into the Capitol. Delay is now the chief hope for a righteous settlement of our national affairs. We think it should be labored more than any other point now at issue, even than the terms of reconstruction. They can wait until the time has arrived when a reconstruction that shall not be ruin shall be possible. Indeed, after the disgrace which the Republicans of Connecticut have brought upon themselves, it may be doubted whether this Congress, at least at this time, will be found ready to insist on the only terms of reconstruction compatible with national safety. But the Republicans may be made to see that no good end can be answered by suffering themselves to be swamped by a coalition of Copperheads and rebels, while much may be gained by waiting the teachings and the influences of time. Give the nation but time enough and all will be well, while nothing but mischief and impotent repentance can come of headlong haste.

TUNIS AND THE UNITED STATES.

That a Tunisian ambassador should come to this country for the purpose of congratulating our Government on the suppression of the rebellion, and offering condolence on the assassination of our chief magistrate, is a circumstance that has an interest of by no means a common character. It takes the mind back some sixty years, when another minister from Tunis was brought to this country in an American ship-of-war, and who treated with our Government, in the name of his master, the Bey, on a footing of perfect equality. If difference there was, it was in favor of that respectable Mussulman, who condescended to negotiate at Washington instead of insisting upon all negotiations taking place in his tight little Regency. True, our Government, though it restored the Tunisian vessels that had been captured while endeavoring to break the blockade our naval force had established before Tripoli, positively refused to pay tribute to the Bey; and let us tell the youthful reader that this refusal was no such a light matter in the year 1805 as it appears to be in the year 1865. To plunder the commerce of Christendom, and to make slaves of all Christians, was the public law—which was nobly sustained by the public opinion—of High Barbary. A law so profitable to the Barbarians was not allowed to fall into desuetude, and there were Christian captives in all the Regencies, to the number of many thousands, at the close of the last century, when our flag began to appear peacefully on the ocean. In a short time the commerce of America grew to be important—and important not only to us, but to the owners and others interested in the corsairs of Northern Africa. Our vessels that went into the Mediterranean, or to ports that lie not far from Gibraltar, though outside of the Straits, became the prey of the Mussulmans, who treated us as their ancestors had treated the people of Spain and Italy centuries before. The effect was almost as bad on our commerce as we have seen produced from the operations of Messrs. Semmes, Maffit & Co. American slaves became very common in African towns, though not quite so common as a certain description of African slaves were in many American towns. Many good men began to believe that Providence had fallen into a mistake in allowing Americans to become slaves in Africa, when it had long been settled, terrestrially at least, that only the descendants of Ham were to be enslaved, and that Americans were specially appointed to profit from that arrangement. They could n't see the propriety of the change that was coming over the ordering of the world. While American Christians were wondering at what was going on, African Mussulmans were capturing our craft, and fine dividends were declared in Barbary at our expense. The cruising business went up. There was a lively demand for shipping. Naval stores ruled high, and quotations were most encouraging. Pious Mohammedans thanked Allah for the appearance of a new nation in the West, that new Evening Land which had supplanted the ancient one. They sincerely entreated him to send them more. But those Barbarians who were of a conservative turn of mind, and cautious, thought that the business might be overdone, and that there would be a glut of Yankees. While there was joy in Africa, there was dismay in America.

Let any one who is curious on the subject turn to files of papers that were published during the twenty years that followed the close of the Revolutionary war, and he will be astonished to see how great was the effect of those African depredations. For a long time our Government submitted to pay tribute to the piratical states and degraded itself in various ways before them. In 1796 a treaty was made with that high and mighty potentate, the Dey of Algiers, in which it was set forth that "the Government of the United States of America is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion." At the beginning of the present century it was determined to try the virtues of force against the corsairs; and the war with Tripoli forms one of the brightest passages in the history of our noble navy. But though the Tripolitans were vigorously chastised, our Government consented to pay money for the American slaves they had in their hands. This was in 1805, and our proceedings involved us in a dispute with the Bey of Tunis, who sent a minister to this country and asked for tribute. Encouraged by our successes over Tripoli, the Tunisian demand was refused, and without evil consequences. In 1815 we had war with Algiers, the Dey having refused even to sell Americans whom he had caused to be captured. Commodore Decatur soon brought him to terms, and since that time we have had no trouble with the deys and beys. Looking back to the times when Americans figured as chattels in the slave marts of Barbary, it is difficult to believe that such things ever could have been; and yet they were, and they affected the early literature of the country almost as deeply as Spanish literature of the sixteenth century was affected by the Mussulman depredations to which Spain was then subjected, even when Philip the Second was king, and though Lepanto had been fought and won. Had there been a Cervantes among the Americans who were carried into the ports of Barbary and there sold, we might almost have been glad at what had taken place, as it would have led to something new in literature.

The Tunisian gentleman who has come to this country in 1865 visits us under circumstances so different from those which his predecessor saw here in 1805-6, that sixty years seem totally inadequate to the change that has taken place. The seven sleepers, whose slumbers had lasted for almost two centuries, saw nothing more remarkable in the way of change than would be visible to one who had visited America in the days of Jefferson and repeated his visit in the days of Johnson. Such repetition is impossible, but an intelligent Mussulman is quite equal to noting the difference that there is between now and then in America. He will be able to understand that our system of government is no longer based on slavery; and he may feel an honest pride in the recollection that his country preceded ours by many years in the noble work of abolishing slavery, which was done by Tunis, we believe, in 1846 or 1847. The Mussulman community was in advance of the Christian nation, and that is an honor of which it cannot be deprived, though we may generously envy it the possession of that honor.

VERY LIKE A MISTAKE.

Some people fail in speech-making because they have nothing to say; others fail because they have too much to say; others, again, because, whether they have too much or too little, they are unable to say it. In which of these predicaments the President found himself on the memorable occasion of his addressing the First District of Columbia Colored Regiment, in front of the White House, we find it difficult to determine. By his own emphatic declaration he had nothing to say. "My object in presenting myself before you is simply to thank you." "I repeat that I appear before you on the present occasion merely to tender you my thanks." "I repeat, I have but little to say." And the reason assigned for this poverty of ideas is the very extraordinary one that his theme is entirely new, his opportunity is fresh, the occasion has had no chance of becoming trite. "I have but little to say, it being unusual in this Government, and in most other governments, to have colored troops engaged in their service." The man who has nothing to say because he ought to have so much, may fairly be classed among the vacant-minded reticents. But Mr. Johnson is not one of these either, for words drop from his lips as if the fulness of his heart forbade their staying in, which hint at thoughts too big for utterance from a balcony. "This is your country as well as anybody else's country." We pardon the grammar for the sake of the syntax. "This country is founded"—we presume the President means the Government or the political system of the country—"is founded upon the principles of equality, and at the same time"—he means, probably, for this reason—"the standard by which persons are to be estimated is according to their merit and their worth." "One great question has been settled in this Government, and that is the question of slavery." "True liberty has been established on a basis more permanent and enduring than heretofore." "It is our duty to try and discover what those great laws are which are at the foundation of all things, and, having discovered what they are, conform our actions and our conduct to them." Words like those are germs of great orations, such as then and there could not be delivered. The speaker was holding himself in to the dimensions of time and space. His task was not to say too much, and incoherence was the result of his attempting to perform it. But they who would put the President in the third category will not be without their reasons. The following passage would give color to their suspicion that he suffered from his inability to say well what was in his mind:

"The United States has lifted its strong arm in vindication of the Government, and of free government, and in lifting that arm and appealing to the God of battles, it has been decided that the institution of slavery must go down. This has been done, and the Goddess of Liberty, in bearing witness over many of our battle-fields since the struggle commenced, has made her loftiest flight, and proclaimed that true liberty has been established."

To us neither of these explanations of the Presidential harangue is quite satisfactory. It is unaffectedly honest; it is natural; it is simple; it is hearty; it is kindly, sensible, and wise. The speaker had a great deal to say; but he seems to have been laboring under some singular hallucination in regard to the class of people he was addressing. After reading the speech through, we turned back to make sure that it was a black regiment that had paid him the compliment of a salute. Every paper in which the speech has been mentioned asserts that it was delivered to the Frst Black Regiment of the District of Columbia; on1 his point there is no dissentient voice. But either the editors were misinformed, or the President was under some kind of illusion. Perhaps it was late in the afternoon, and so dark that the complexion of the men could not be distinguished. Perhaps the black visors of their military caps were taken by the speaker to be the cause of the shadow that rested on their faces. Whatever the ground of his mistake may have been, a mistake there clearly was, for it is evident that the President supposed he was addressing a regiment of whites composed of that class to which he himself at one time belonged, and from which he released himself by such incredible efforts of his manly will.

This is a matter on which our mind cannot entertain the faintest shadow of a doubt. The speech itself is conclusive on the question. We will quote a few passages to show that the orator must have presumed that the troops before him were of the Southern white variety: "You have observed, no doubt, that for him who does his duty faithfully and honestly there is always a public judgment that will appreciate and measure out to him his proper reward." If the President said that wittingly to a company of black men, he must have said it with a great deal of laughter in his sleeve or a great deal of sarcasm in his tone—neither of which we will credit; for the negro whose observation of life could teach him that, has not yet made his appearance on the planet. But it was a timely saying for white men, who certainly have discovered, without much observation either, that amnesty, pardon, and abundant restoration of estate, were ready for those who exhibited the most alacrity in returning to their old duty to the Government. This is a fact that lies patent to all observation—probably to that of the negroes also, though to them it would hardly be as consoling as the orator designed.

We pass to another point. The President urges, with some repetition, on his audience, that "upon the return of peace and the surrender of the enemies of the country, it should be the duty of every patriot and of every one who calls himself a Christian to remember that with the termination of the war his resentment should cease, that angry feelings should subside, and that every man should become calm and tranquil, and be prepared for what is before him." We have heard much of the anger that still seethes and flames at the South, of the sparks of malignity that will not die with the rebellion; but thus far these glowing embers have been discovered in white bosoms; and the objects of hate are the black people, and particularly the black soldiers, who have done such good service in putting the rebellion down. They are the persecuted party, and the wonder about them is that they bear their persecution so meekly. The President's advice is admirable. It is simply a pity that some person by did not tell him that the men before him were not the men he took them for, and that possibly his remarks might seem to them not exactly pertinent to the occasion. The speaker would of course have been glad to correct a mistake which, harmless as it was, could not fail to produce a disagreeable impression. His kindly nature must have been wounded since, on discovering the inadvertence into which he had been betrayed.

The suggestion, very pointedly reiterated, that "liberty is not a mere idea—a mere vagary;" that when his hearers "come to examine this question of liberty, they will not be mistaken in a mere idea for a reality;"—this suggestion, we submit, could have been intended for the benefit of those—of all those and of those only—who hold that liberty is "a mere idea, a mere vagary," and those are the great mass of the Southern whites. To the blacks liberty is a supreme reality, an absorbing and celestial reality. They pray with heart and hand that it may not be "a mere idea, a mere vagary," as many of them begin to fear it will be. Let liberty mean something to us! is their cry. It has been the dream of ages, let it now become a fact! We are willing to make it so if the superior race is willing. We wait their pleasure, not they ours.

We have already vindicated, we think, our theory of the President's harangue, that it was made in the understanding that a regiment of Southern whites stood before him. But the point is so interesting that we will push our illustrations a little further. "Liberty does not consist in idleness," the orator goes on to say. "Liberty does not consist in being worthless. Liberty does not consist in doing all things as we please. Liberty consists in the glorious privilege of work." Admirable doctrine! Worthy of a President of the United States, and especially fine as coming from a man who had honored work, and whom work has honored as it honors few. How his heart must have beat with satisfaction while he enforced it, as he supposed he was doing, on a company of men who had been, we cannot say educated, but reared in habits of idleness and sloth—in the idea that work was degrading, in the notion that soldiering and hunting were the only work a gentleman could perform; to whom liberty did mean precisely the privilege of doing just what they pleased, even to the buying and selling of their fellow-creatures, and who, instead of being willing to enter into the new system, which meant fair work and fair wages for all without distinction of color, were complaining that the strong necessities of labor were to be put upon them. And how sad the good man must have felt when he learned that the brave words which he intended should have stirred up his soulless fellow-citizens of Tennessee did actually fall on the ears of men who did pretty much all the work that was done in the States recently in rebellion, who were the working class there, who were then clamoring for land to work on and for tools to work with, who were maintaining themselves and their families while their white neighbors were subsisting on the Government, and who, in many cases, had laid up money for the purchase of farms and stock, and the extension of their industry.

And yet this injustice was small in comparison with another that would have been done if the President had really known that he was addressing black soldiers, for he proceeds to warn them solemnly that "liberty does not mean simply to resort to low saloons and other places of disreputable character;" that "liberty does not mean that people ought to live in licentiousness." We would not seem to intimate that black soldiers as well as white soldiers, as well as all the people for that matter, might not do wisely to heed such a lesson as this. But why the black people peculiarly? Do the black people in Tennessee support the saloons, the dance-houses, the gin-shops, the gambling-hells, and other disreputable institutions? Are intemperance and lasciviousness distinguishing vices of them? Are they above all others infamous for their disregard of the marriage bond? If they are culpable in all these points, as doubtless they are, we should ask, Who taught them? Who set them the example? Who, in multitudes of cases, are directly answerable for their iniquity by compelling them to concubinage? These are painful questions to put, and we will put no more. President Johnson is one of the kindest of men; and, in our judgment, there would have been great unkindness in deliberately charging all these enormities on poor people who had been more sinned against than sinning—who, in so far as they were degraded, were the victims of a social order which they had had no hand in creating—and who can do little or nothing for their own moral regeneration in the future until the superior class encourage them to pursue a better course of life. This superior and corrupting class consisted of the men who lay fairly open to the President's earnest admonition, and there can be no doubt that he meant to address himself to that class primarily if not exclusively. That he has missed the opportunity of doing so is a great misfortune.

THE GASTEIN CONVENTION,

by which Austria and Prussia endeavored to settle the question of the disposition that shall be made of the Duchies wrested from Denmark, has given offence to everybody but the high contracting parties. Russia avows her neutrality, which is a civil way of condemning what was done. France speaks out very plainly in condemnation of a course that is really a condemnation of her mode of settling matters when territory is to be disposed of. England, through Earl Russell, flatly rebukes the two great German powers, and upholds the right of the people of the Duchies to have something to say when their countries are disposed of—a doctrine that finds more favor in England in 1865 than it found in 1815, when the robbers and jobbers who constituted the Congress of Vienna did as they pleased with the many millions of men whom the event of war had placed in their hands. But the most bitter complaints proceed from Holstein, one of the countries so cavalierly used by the conquerors of the Danish forces that sought to hold the Duchies. Members of the Holstein Estates have addressed the Federal Diet in strong terms. After describing what their hopes had been, because of the victories of the Austro-Prussian armies, they proceed to say that they have been bitterly deceived; and they make a formidable bill of indictment against those who came to their relief, but only to substitute one tyranny for another, the second being worse than the first. They show that the deliverers have done what was not done under the Danish rule: they have not allowed the Estates to assemble, and make known the wants of the people, and express their sentiments concerning matters in the settlement of which they have the deepest interest. "Nearly a year has passed since the Vienna peace," they say, "but the Duchies are still without their legitimate sovereign, and without a representation of the country summoned to co-operate in shaping their present and future. . . . The land has not yet been heard since it passed into German hands. Its boundaries have been altered, different governments have been given it in rapid succession, violent attacks have been made upon its administration and the hitherto existing order of its institutions, and its financial means have been disposed of; but it has not been considered necessary to take the sense of its representatives." A gloomy picture enough, and a correct one; but what good is anticipated by the worthy Holsteiners from sending their complaints to the Federal Diet? That respectable body has very little more power in Germany than the Canadian Parliament has in the United States. It cannot prevent Austria and Prussia from doing as they shall think proper in disposing of the Duchies, those powers having invariably treated its suggestions with contempt, and acted with reference only to their own interests and ideas. Could the Diet do anything, it would speedily settle a matter that has troubled a large portion of the world for centuries; but the Diet is as powerless as the Duchies themselves, and for the same reason: because bayonets are at the command of the Austrians and Prussians. The dispute has been an affair of strength from the beginning of its present phase. The Germans were too strong for the Danes, the Austrians and Prussians being Germans so long as the Danes were unsubdued, but falling back into what may be called their normal state so soon as the Danes had been driven out, and the question came up, "What shall be done with this rich spoil?"

If there was anybody in Germany who supposed that Prussia acted from any other motive than the promotion of her own interests, as those interests are understood by Count Bismarck, all we can say is that there must be some very simple people in that fine country. Whether Prussian policy be commendable or condemnable, there can be no doubt as to its plainness. It has been steadily pursued for centuries, with a regard for the unities that would have charmed Mr. Curdle, had that gentleman ever directed his studies to the history of politics. There is "a sort of a general oneness" in her policy that has its merit, though persons of a moral turn of mind have sometimes found occasion to condemn some of its details. Prussia has got possession of Lauenberg, but that is merely by way of lunch. She means to dine on the Duchies, and evidently she expects that Austria will serve them up to her, after such exhibitions of coyness as may be thought necessary to save the proprieties. But what is Austria to have in return for helping Prussia to what she wants? That is the question which puzzles the observer. That she is giving her aid gratis is not to be believed. That is not the way they do business at Vienna; and least of all would they do it for the advantage of Berlin, were liberality and magnanimity their rules of action in ordering their foreign policy. Austria, like Lovegold, must have something solid, or she will never allow Prussia to grow in territory, and increase in numbers, at the expense of Germany. But in arranging that matter, which demands arrangement so pressingly, the two powers may chance to afford to Napoleon III. an opportunity to demand a rectification of the French frontier on the side of the Rhine; and this it is that gives a world-wide interest to the whole subject, and compels men to look at it, even while admitting their inability to understand its true merits. France cannot sneeze without moving the world, and German snuff may set her a-sneezing in a very alarming manner.

A NEW DANGER TO THE SOUTH.

THE World last week devoted two columns to an attempt to show that if the negroes get the franchise they will inevitably turn Mormons, and establish polygamy. In support of this startling prediction it cites the last census report, Malte Brun, Dr. Livingstone, and Dr. Draper. The census report asserts that there is a great deal of licentiousness amongst the blacks in America. Malte Brun says there is a good deal amongst the negro savages in Africa, and that they are addicted to fetichism. Dr. Livingstone says that, like the Greeks and Romans, they mingle debauchery with some of their religious ceremonies. Finally, Dr. Draper says that the "African ideas" are still "in the blood" of the American negroes. Ergo, if you enfranchise them, Mormons they will become.

This is startling; but there is another danger on which the writer has not treated, and that is the risk of the Southern negroes becoming Mohammedans and cannibals. We are sorry that some Democratic journal has not taken this subject up, as we are unable to devote the space to it that it deserves. The idea may seem absurd to some people, but we challenge examination for it. The arguments in support of it are numerous and powerful. Foremost amongst them is the fact that there is already a large body of colored Mussulmans whom our war has made acquainted with the suffering condition of their race in this country, and who have the usual Mohammedan enthusiasm for the propagation of their faith. That Mohammedan fanaticism has died out, nobody will pretend who recalls the Syrian massacres of 1859–60, and who is acquainted with the character of the present Sheikh-ul-Islam. The feelings of this dignitary towards the Southern whites are, we trust, too well known to our readers to need description from us; and everybody who has watched the current of events in the East is well aware that the Mohammedan virus has grown in Asia and Africa in the ratio of the decline of the Ottoman power in Europe.

We may imagine, therefore, what the effect would be of the appearance amongst the excited and mobile "hands" of the Southern plantations of a few colored Mussulmans preaching the Koran, polygamy, and death to the "giaours." The man who doubts their success must be a very strange sort of person. "What," as Dr. Draper says, "does the inexorable hand of History write?" Did not a large portion of the civilized world once succumb to these same terrible propagandists, and what is there about the negro, we may well ask, to warrant us in supposing that he would resist agencies before which the Greeks, the Macedonians, the Assyrians, the Egyptians, and Persians fell? What could be more attractive, also, to a licentious race than a creed which permits each man to keep as many wives as he can afford to support, and, in the case of extravagant and unscrupulous persons, of more than they can afford to support, and which in the "dancing dervishes" and "howling dervishes" provides an institution in which the negro love of extravagant and uproarious worship can be fully gratified? And does anybody suppose that the appearance here of the ambassadors from Tunis, the most fanatical of Mussulman states, at this particular juncture has no significance?

The subject of the probable establishment of cannibalism at the South, in case the suffrage is conferred on the blacks, is one which we approach with great reluctance. Malte Brun has not touched upon it; the census report is silent about it; and it is not amongst the horrible things which Dr. Draper believes to be very likely to occur. But if anybody supposes that we derive all our information as to negro weaknesses and tendencies from these sources, he is greatly mistaken. The disgusting nature of the subject, and the inability of most of our readers to read Greek and Latin with ease and fluency, must form our excuse for withholding the authorities on which we rely in this matter for the present. When the proper time comes we shall reveal them, and shall also produce an à priori argument, which we are at present preparing, which we flatter ourselves will be found to be unanswerable, that the well known love of the negro for tender meat—a vice which has been remarked by some of the most accurate philosophic travellers—is capable, under certain social and political conditions, of being developed into a craving for white babies, and that this craving he would, if once in possession of the franchise, embody in legislation in those States in which his race was in a majority, by exacting tithes of their offspring from white mothers. The horror which the very name of negro suffrage inspires in so many of our Southern brethren is doubtless due to their knowledge of the existence of this taste amongst the colored population, but which, with that dignified reserve which has always marked their language when touching upon negro frailties, they for the present refuse to reveal.

DROUYN DE LHUYS ON SPOLIATION.

Diplomatists must have bad memories, or they must suppose that all other men have them, for they write as if the most common transactions were unknown to the world at large. M. Drouyn de Lhuys, in that diplomatic circular in which he cuts up the Gastein Convention, states that the arrangement made by Austria and Prussia for a division of the spoil torn immediately by their armies from Denmark, has no other foundation than force, and that its sole justification is the convenience of the spoliating parties, who have spoiled the people of the Duchies, Denmark, and Germany. "This," says the French minister, with as much gravity as if he thought he were imposing upon all the world without the least danger of being detected—"this is a practice to which Europe has now become unaccustomed." There is nothing to be said in defence of the action of the allies, but they have done nothing more than was done by France in Italy, after the conclusion of the Italian war, the governments of those countries consulting nothing but their own convenience when Savoy and Nice were annexed to the French Empire, a piece of annexation that gave as much offence in certain quarters as that which has followed from the annexation of Lauenberg to Prussia. France "realized" Savoy and Nice simply because she had several hundred thousand bayonets to establish her claim to them; and Prussia gets hold of Lauenberg in exactly the same way. Mr. Carlyle tells us that "the only real treaties are a well-trained army and your treasury full," which cynical sentence, if not true as a rule, is certainly true as of Prussian practice. Prussia has a well-trained army, and a treasury which, if not full, is respectably furnished, which is more than can be said of most European public chests. Having men and money, and opportunity to use them in the business of territorial acquisition, it is the most natural of all things for the Prussian Government to employ them as it has employed them—just as Napoleon III. made use of his soldiers and the money he borrowed of his subjects to effect something in the way of obtaining her "natural boundaries" for France. The wonder is, that the French Minister for Foreign Affairs should be so blind to the folly of reproaching Prussia for doing what has been done by France herself, Italy helping her in much the same fashion that Austria aided Prussia. At Berlin they have small pretensions to saintliness; but it does not lie in the mouths of the sinners of Paris to reproach them for their fallings away from grace.

M. Drouyn de Lhuys tells the allies, through his circular, that "violence and conquest pervert the notions of right and the consciences of nations." Not the least doubt of the truth of this piece of commonplace can be so much as hinted; but how happens it that this profound moralist—and that yet greater moralist, his Imperial master—should be engaged in organizing violence in Mexico and in striving to conquer that country? Whose notions of right and whose consciences were perverted by the French invasion of Mexico, and the waging of war against Mexicans by French soldiers, whose presence there is the sole sustaining power of Maximilian's throne? Bad as the King of Prussia's conduct may be considered, it is decent and honest when compared with what the French Emperor has done in Mexico. William I. has violently added a German duchy to a German kingdom; and though he has broken his word to do this, it does not follow that the Lauenbergers will be any the worse for his action—and it is the people's welfare that deserves most to be considered in all transactions like that in which the Prussian monarch has engaged. Napoleon III. has sent French soldiers to a land that is four thousand miles from France, and the population of which bear no resemblance to Frenchmen; and these soldiers are to be "the best of cut-throats" in the worst of causes: they are to kill, or to be killed, in order that their Emperor may establish a claim to some portion of Mexico on the man who had received it all from him, nominally, though he had no right to dispose of a Mexican acre. His career of "violence and conquest" in Aztec land, it must strike most men, is as much worse than that of William I. in Germany as accidental homicide is worse than deliberate murder. It is not impossible that the Prussian sovereign has been forced to the line he has adopted by circumstances; but we know that the French sovereign coolly attacked Mexico, and that he meant to be paid for attacking her by compelling her to cede to him a portion of her territory. His violence is perfect—his conquest is not so clear or certain.

MR. GREELEY ON THE RIGHT OF REVOLUTION.

Rash writing often involves the writer in trouble and brings annoyance to his friend. Ill-considered printing, by reason of its greater publicity, is far more embarrassing in its consequences to the printer, and, if he be a representative man, may seriously damage the cause with which he is identified. For four years Mr. Greeley has had practical and very unpleasant experience in this. At the outset of the rebellion, before the war of words was silenced by the roar of a more dreadful artillery, Mr. Greeley amazed his old Whig associates, whose political text-book was Webster's reply to Hayne, by conceding, in the editorial columns of the Tribune, that the Southern States had as good a right to dissolve the Union in 1861 as the American Colonies had to sever their connection with Great Britain in 1776.

Since that unfortunate concession, neither Southern rebels, nor Northern sympathizers, nor personal enemies, have permitted Mr. Greeley to rest, and it is doubtful that he will hear the last of it during the term of his natural life. Vice-President Stephens, in his application for pardon, defended the action which made a pardon necessary by appealing to the Tribune. Secession editors found in its files texts for any number of leading articles. Copperheads who opposed the war were supplied with their sharpest weapons in the words of the editor. The hardest blow dealt his antagonist by Thurlow Weed was a simple reference to the opinions of the former, avowed at a time when the heresy of State rights should have been exposed and denounced by the friends of the country in the strongest language. It is perhaps not too much to say that nothing uttered by any unofficial person so hurt the cause of the Union as this concession by one whose unreserved devotion to that cause is undoubted.

As a rule, Mr. Greeley submits silently to the consequences, but has recently encumbered his otherwise admirable letter to the Wisconsin Republicans with an explanation. After quoting the declaration of "self-evident truths," he says:

"This statement—though its precise words are Jefferson's, endorsed by John Adams, Franklin, Hancock, and their compeers—is a condensation of the political faith of John Hampden, Algernon Sidney, Milton, Locke, and all the great confessors and martyrs of Anglo-Saxon liberty, as reproduced in the fervid eloquence of James Otis, Warren, Patrick Henry, and their compatriots. If it is not sound and just, then my grandfathers were both forsworn rebels and traitors, and the American Revolution a successful crime. If it is true, who shall say that 'ten millions of people,' inhabiting eleven States, may not invoke it, as rightfully as three millions of people inhabiting thirteen colonies?

"For my part, I stand by the faith and the fame of my ancestors. I deny that any State has a constitutional right to secede from the Union, any more than a county has to secede from a State; but I affirm the right of a people to frame and alter their political institutions according to their calm, deliberate judgment and collective sense of what is due to their own safety and well-being. This doctrine has been re-affirmed in our day by John Quincy Adams, Abraham Lincoln, and other discerning, conservative thinkers, no one dissenting or demurring.

"I did propose, in strict accordance therewith, that the Southern people, after full and fair discussion, should decide, by an open, popular vote, the question of Union or Disunion. I believed that they would, by a large majority, vote to stay in the Union; and I have now no shadow of doubt that they would have done so. Most surely, they did give a large majority for the Union in the elections held by them during the winter of 1860–61; as they had given, the November previous, in the Presidential contest. And the arrogant precipitancy wherewith the oligarchy of South Carolina hurled their State into secession, refusing to wait for any show of consultation or co-operation, with the kindred refusal in most States to submit the ordinance of secession to a popular vote, showed clearly that the conspirators were fully aware of the truth. In fact, they opened fire on Fort Sumter precisely because they found it impossible to maintain in peace even the appearance of popular support. 'You must sprinkle blood in the faces of the Southern people,' urged one of them; and his ruthless counsel was followed."

Perhaps the impracticability of Mr. Greeley's plan is a perfect answer to his argument. He shows plainly that in the rebellion of 1861 the popular voice was not regarded and the popular will was powerless. In the nature of things, could it have been otherwise? Movements such as that which culminated in secession are not of the people. They are controlled by a few bold and dexterous leaders, who, so far from shaping their actions by the will of the masses, mould that will to their own designs. They appeal to the emotions rather than to the reason of the people, and the latter, highly impassioned, instead of calmly passing judgment on the original question, are carried on the top wave of excitement far beyond it. This was true, in a measure, of our own Revolution—in no other particular resembling the slaveholders' rebellion. When the colonists first protested against the injustice of the British Government and prepared to enforce their rights, independence of the crown was contemplated by very few of the people. Even while the great Declaration was under debate, had the question of its adoption been submitted to the popular vote, the result would have been at least doubtful. But the impetuous harangues of orators, the exciting language of the press, and, lastly, the stirring words of the Declaration itself, bore down the opposition.

But, admitting that a fair vote of the people of the Southern States on the question of secession could have been had, we deny its binding force. The people of a State can no more vote it out of the Union than the people of a county can vote it out of the State, and for the same reason. New York County cannot vote itself out of the State, because the rights of the people of Kings, and Oneida, and St. Lawrence, and other counties are involved. South Carolina cannot vote herself out of the Union, because the rights of the people of New York, and Massachusetts, and Ohio, and other States are involved. Even had Mr. Greeley contended that the votes of the people of the whole Union ought to decide whether it should be dissolved, his position would not have been impregnable. The right of revolution is fully recognized in this country at least. Whether that right may be exercised in a particular case is a moral and political question that cannot be decided by a vote at the polls. Majorities can be had for the wrong as well as for the right—as Connecticut has just conclusively proved. The people of a State, under the influence of ambitious and reckless leaders, might inaugurate a wicked rebellion, as in 1861: under the guidance of pure patriots they might achieve a righteous revolution, as in 1776.

The weakest point in Mr. Greeley's position is found in the fact that, like the sages of the London Times and Saturday Review, in deciding upon the justifiability of an attempt at revolution, he treats the motives of those who inaugurate it as of no consequence. He asserts in substance that a desire to revolt is all that is necessary to make a revolt lawful. This, with all respect be it spoken, is simply twaddle. There is no support to be found for any such doctrine in any system of ethics or in the practice of any Christian state. In order to justify even an attempt at revolution, its instigators and conductors, whether they form a majority or minority, must show not simply that they have a good chance of succeeding, but that they have grievances such as the conscience of the civilized world will recognize as grievances, and which there is no possibility of redressing except by an appeal to force.

Correspondence.

LETTER FROM "A YANKEE."

To the Editor of The Nation:

You, among others, have done me the honor of making a letter of mine, published in the London Spectator of August 26, the subject of repeated comment. I am, I trust, not quite so unwise as to attempt to argue down adverse criticism, and the editor of The Nation is, I am sure, not so unfair as to wish to gain a point by misrepresenting a writer whose statement he seeks to invalidate. I therefore attribute to inadvertence and excitement some errors on your part in regard to the letter in question which I beg leave to correct.

The first is a statement, more than once made, and repeated to-day, that I said that "the best people of the North hold the negro in 'unutterable loathing.'" You are quite in error; I said no such thing. I mentioned a single instance in which a gentleman, known to me as a benefactor of that race, and, as I am, an ardent advocate of their unconditional and well secured freedom, used that phrase to express his personal feeling toward them. But what I did say was, that the mass of the people here had "an antipathy to social contact with the negro." If The Nation means to deny the truth of this statement, I certainly shall not sustain it by argument or evidence. In the assertion, too, that I spoke of "the 'awful' gulf of separation which exists between the two races in this country," the word "awful," which, in my judgment, gives that clause its character, does not appear in my letter. And if The Nation means to deny that there is a gulf of separation between the races in this country, I shall only wonder why its conductors expend so much money and ability in building a bridge over solid ground.

But were it not for the following paragraph in your article of October 28, in which you have thought it proper to attribute motives to my letter, and to deduce from them an estimate of my personal tastes and sympathies, I should not trouble you with this communication. You say of "A Yankee" that "his letters have all been more or less marred by his attempting to secure English sympathy for the free States in the late struggle by showing the existence here of strong aristocratic or caste feeling, and by making out Northern society very much less democratic, and far more 'genteel,' than 'good society' in London has been pleased to imagine it. He has evidently supposed that if he could prove that we had not departed so very far, after all, from the great British model, that we still retained a class to be despised and a class to despise it, the English public would at once recognize the wrong it had done the North, and fall upon its neck and blubber out its sympathy. This, in our opinion, was a great mistake, though one into which it was not unnatural for a writer who evidently himself winces under democracy to fall."

Now I wish to say very distinctly that the letters in question were written entirely without the intention of "attempting to secure English sympathy for the free States in the late struggle" by any means whatever. They were written with no purpose of conciliation; but merely in the belief that telling the simple truth, although it might be disappointing or unacceptable at times, would in the end be of service to both countries, Great Britain and the United States. Deliberate conciliation is, in my judgment, very poor business; and I cannot understand how a man who ever beholds his natural face in a glass can be false to his intellectual convictions. And so far have I been from attempting to secure British sympathy in the correspondence in question, that the editors of the Spectator, remarkable as they are among journalists for candor and moral hardihood, have several times expostulated with me upon the repelling manner in which I presented my case. But my reply has always been that although I intended to be fair, and desired always to be considerate of the feelings of my readers, I must tell the truth, and tell it just as I saw it and felt it, or tell nothing at all. I have not sought to present a picture of my country adapted to the prejudices of my readers. If they could sympathize with it as it was, I was glad; if not, I thought that we had better do without their sympathy as best we could.

Least of all have I sought to please what you call "aristocratic" tastes. A democrat, pure and simple, from conviction, I should have been very false if I had yielded for conciliation's sake one jot of the political principle to which is due the real glory of this country. If, indeed, I thought that democracy filled society with coarseness, brutality, low tastes and habits, I am sure that the editor of The Nation would be among the last to think it strange that I should "wince" under it. But believing, as I do, that democracy softens the manners and elevates the tastes of a people, and, by widening the sympathies, increases and diffuses that mutual respect and consideration which is the charm and the safeguard of social intercourse, and, in a word, makes a higher style of gentlemen and more of them than aristocracy, I do not wince under democracy, and do not like to be represented as doing so. I think it more than probable that it is this view of the effect of democracy upon manners that has been mistaken for a desire to represent it as something better than it seems to appear in the eyes of my censor.

As to the logical dilemma prepared for me by the editors of the Spectator, THE NATION, and the Independent, to wit: that either there is no antipathy against social intercourse with the negro here, or else that the bestowal of the elective franchise upon negroes will not be followed by intermarriage of the races—that gives me no trouble, as they may see who think it worth their while to read two forthcoming letters upon this subject.

A YANKEE.

NEW YORK, October 12, 1865.

The word "awful," it is true, was ours, not "A Yankee's." It was ascribed to him by a typographical error, but the "gulf of separation" between the two races, as he described it in his letter to the Spectator, was "awful." It is also true that he did not state in express terms that the best people of the North held the negro in "unutterable loathing," but he produced one of the "best people," a "gentle, firm, wise man, with a large soul and wide sympathies," who did feel for the negro "an unutterable loathing," and presented him to us, as we understood it, and as the Spectator certainly understood it, as a representative man. If the gentleman in question was not brought before us in that character, he was absolutely useless for the purpose of "A Yankee's" argument. His appearance on the stand was clearly intended to suggest to the English public the question: "If a man of this stamp feels thus, how must the common run of Americans feel?"

"A Yankee" is mistaken in supposing that the conductors of THE NATION are "expending money or ability" in trying to establish social equality between blacks and whites. The social relations of people are matters of taste, with which we have nothing to do. We shall never urge anybody to invite a negro to his house, or give him his daughter in marriage, any more than we should think of urging "A Yankee" to prove his democratic feeling by associating with white hackmen or hod-carriers. What we do seek for the negro is equality before the law, such as prevails between a Parisian water-carrier and the Duc de Rohan, or between a London cabman and the Earl of Derby. This accomplished, we propose to leave him to make his own social position, get his wife, and his invitations to dinner, as other men get them, as best he can.

To support our assertions with regard to "A Yankee's" mode of working on English opinion would require a long review of his otherwise excellent and able letters. For this we have neither space nor inclination, and, as the matter is of minor importance, we are quite willing to accept his denial as conclusive. We shall look for his escape from the "logical dilemma" with considerable interest.

MONUMENTAL HONORS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

The genius of Byron has popularized the story of Marino Faliero, the Venetian chief magistrate who, in a fit of resentment for a private wrong, plotted the ruin of his country. The crime of Faliero was punished by a shameful death, and the republic stigmatized it with an ignominious commemoration by substituting for his portrait, in the series of ducal effigies, a tablet with this incription: "THIS IS THE PLACE OF MARINO FALIERO, BEHEADED FOR TREASON."

The case of Faliero is by no means the only one where the public justice of Italy has pursued the name of a rank offender with a vengeance extending beyond the scaffold. Travellers, who knew Genoa before the progress of modern improvement had shorn even that emphatically "slow" city of many tokens of her quaint mediæval grandeur, will remember seeing, in public places, inscribed tablets erected by the government to the perpetual infamy of flagrant criminals. Several of these curious memorials are still preserved in the court of the University, and copies of others are to be found in the old municipal records.

Thus, in 1550, when the traitor Stephen Raggio, a prototype of our own Ruffin, had anticipated his execution by suicide, the memory of his crimes was perpetuated by a public inscription, which was not removed until 1816.

Another lapidary record of the same year transmits to posterity the infamy of John Paul Balbi, a traitor and "vectigalium famosus expilator," which latter phrase may be Genoese Latin for "shoddy."

Another, of 1672, performs the like good service for the name of Raphael de la Torre, a rebel and pirate, the Raphael Semmes of his day.

Many other instances of this monumental reprobation might be cited from Italian history, and even our own country is not wholly wanting in analogous examples. Not many years ago, the town authorities of a justly celebrated country village in New England cut down, in spite of urgent remonstrances, an ancient and majestic elm standing on the private grounds of a resident of the town, because, in the course of its slow growth, its trunk had gradually encroached on the sidewalk to the width, perhaps, of a "selectman's" hat-brim. The owner of the tree put up a tablet to commemorate this act of petty tyranny. But he either superabounded in discretion, or was deficient in courage, and he did not venture to record the names of the officials who, in the pride of municipal despotism, had sacrificed the venerated tree. Hence the satire was pointless. It was anonymous, impersonal, and, stigmatizing the act rather than the actors, it punished nobody. Besides, being only an expression of private indignation, it wanted the solemnity of a public and authoritative sanction.

Modern indulgence usually exempts humble political offenders from the extreme penalties with which their transgressions were visited by earlier criminal jurisprudence, while greater and more conspicuous conspirators against the liberties of their native land are seldom so much as cited before any other tribunal than those of conscience and of public opinion. Semmes is still at liberty, and in the full enjoyment of the fruits of his piratical cruises. The malignant and mischievous incendiaries, Toombs and Wise, are free, if not pardoned, and the philosophic and now persecuted Greeley's "universal amnesty" would embrace not only these worthies and his correspondents Sanders and Tucker, but Wirz, Champ Ferguson, Quantrell, and Blackburn. Even the overthrow of the statues and triumphal arches which deposed usurpers had erected in honor of their own exploits, the erasure of their names and inscriptions from public monuments, and the removal of their portraits from national galleries, have been generally considered as expressions of partisan animosity, and as a mode, if not of violating, at least of suppressing historical fact, while the exclusion of the busts of Luther and of Cromwell from the Bavarian Valhalla and the British Parliament House has been almost universally condemned, even by those who dissent from their theological and political opinions and disapprove their public acts, as indicative of a spirit which savors rather of religious intolerance and aristocratic prejudice than of a love of liberty or of truth.

We have had, and still have, magistrates, heroes, and sages who have carried with them to the grave the love and respect of a mourning nation, or who are now enjoying the best earthly reward of virtue and of patriotism, the approbation of a grateful country—our traitors who, like Floyd, have died despised even by their accomplices in crime, our Marino Falieros who, having been spared by our regular criminal tribunals and by the red-handed vengeance of popular justice, still live "infamous and contented."

Our patriots, dead and living, have received few of those monumental honors which older nations so profusely bestow on departed and on contemporary greatness; our political parricides none of those solemn testimonials of national execration, of which I have cited some examples. The history of even a great and good man may sometimes be epitomized in a single phrase, and in that of the bad there is frequently some salient fact, some damning lie, some crowning trait of meanness or of wrong, the bare name of which may serve as a perpetual brand. Men often unconsciously write their own truest epitaphs, and the publicity of the lives of our prominent citizens, the multiplicity of their official action, and the necessity they are under of frequently expressing their opinions and purposes, are constantly making their language a part of the res gestæ, as the lawyers say, constantly bringing out from them utterances of word or deed which aptly characterize and represent the man who gives them voice and substance. The use of such typical expressions, the specification of such distinguishing acts, in monumental inscriptions, is at once the fittest and the fairest method of transmitting to after ages the memory of men eminent for good or evil. It avoids the necessity of pronouncing a public judgment on their career, the danger of tarnishing by a solemn and lasting stigma, or of elevating by hyperbolical praise, characters whose real guilt or real worth is disputable. Friends and enemies alike must acquiesce in the truth of the record derived from the tongue or the known official acts of him whose life it commemorates. Each will interpret the words, each explain the act, in accordance with his views of the character of the man. The patriot will find in the self written epitaph of a patriot, he who sympathizes with treason in that of a traitor, aphorisms, opinions, or facts which commend themselves to his moral sense, and each will be free to judge the statesman of opposite principles on evidence the truth of which none can gainsay.

To exemplify: Instead of refusing room to the bust of the late Chief-Justice Taney in the halls of the Supreme Court of the United States, let us place by the side of the noble and expansive traits of Marshall the pinched and Mephistophelean features of his successor, with this inscription:

HE DECLARED THAT IN THE OPINION OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY, AND ESPECIALLY IN THAT OF THE FRAMERS OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES, "THE NEGRO HAD NO RIGHTS WHICH THE WHITE MAN WAS BOUND TO RESPECT."

The doughface, the Copperhead, the theologian who finds Scripture authority for the existence and specific character of Southern negro slavery, will approve these words as the expression of a political, a social, an economical, a divinely revealed religious truth; the advocate of universal liberty will condemn them as a flagitious libel on modern civilization, an atrocious calumny against the noble founders of our commonwealth, a stupendous lie invented and pronounced for the most nefarious purposes—and yet all will agree in the truth and appropriateness of the inscription.

In like manner, neither friend nor foe could object to this legend on the pedestal of Millard Fillmore's bust:

AN ACT TO AMEND AND SUPPLEMENTARY TO AN ACT ENTITLED: AN ACT RESPECTING FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE, AND PERSONS ESCAPING FROM THE SERVICE OF THEIR MASTERS. "APPROVED SEPTEMBER 18, 1850. MILLARD FILLMORE."

And as this is rather a short inscription for the image of so conspicuous a personage, we might add a paragraph from his Albany and Buffalo speech of 1856, in which he threatened the Union with the vengeance of the South, and prophesied, if he did not invoke, a pro-slavery rebellion, in case the people should dare to elect to the Presidency his Republican rival instead of himself.

Both those who admire and those who view with loathing and with scorn the official career of Franklin Pierce—for even he had his admirers. Did not Hawthorne write his biography? Even he had his detractors. Did not the Herald habitually style him "poor Pierce"?—will read with equal satisfaction this record beneath his portrait:

"I HAVE NEVER BELIEVED THAT THE ACTUAL DISRUPTION OF THE UNION CAN OCCUR WITHOUT THE SHEDDING OF BLOOD; BUT IF, THROUGH THE MADNESS OF NORTHERN ABOLITIONISM, THE DIRE CALAMITY MUST COME, THE FIGHTING WILL NOT BE ALL SOUTH OF MASON AND DIXON'S LINE MERELY—IT WILL BE WITHIN OUR OWN BORDERS—IN OUR OWN STREETS—BETWEEN THE TWO CLASSES OF CITIZENS TO WHOM I HAVE REFERRED. THOSE WHO DEFY THE LAW AND SCOUT CONSTITUTIONAL OBLIGATIONS WILL, IF WE EVER REACH THE ARBITRAMENT OF ARMS, FIND OCCUPATION ENOUGH AT HOME."—Letter to Jefferson Davis, July 6, 1860.

So when a marble likeness of James Buchanan shall recall to the spectator the late John M. Clayton's judgment on his physiognomy, he will acquiesce, whatever may be his political opinions, in the fitness of writing under it, in letters of blood, the word

LECOMPTON.

In like manner the words and deeds of Wood and Vallandigham and Voorhees and Booth, of the late Martin Van Buren and James K. Polk, and of a certain always too late American general, who being now forgotten shall be nameless, as well as of hundreds of other statesmen and soldiers who in their time have been the glory or the shame of their country, would furnish abundance of appropriate and pithy illustration of their monumental effigies.

Cannot some one of your contributors who has leisure and means of reference furnish you an article on the eminent men of America as characterized by themselves? VIATOR.

ROME, ITALY, Sept. 25, 1865.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

XIV.

RALEIGH, N. C., Oct. 5.

I REACHED this city on the evening of the 27th of September, at an hour somewhat later than I had expected, having been detained in the morning at Pittsboro' by an incident that I have learned to look upon as a common occurrence. My landlord was obliged to despatch servants through all the neighborhood to get a note changed, but their endeavors, whether honest or otherwise, were not successful, and after being kept from the road for more than an hour it became necessary to depart and leave with him five dollars in payment for one night's stay. The ordinary charge was two dollars in silver, he said; in greenbacks he 'd have to charge four dollars. Throughout the country districts there is yet a decided distrust of paper money—a distrust quite natural, founded as it is upon all that the people know of Confederate notes and bonds, and upon their ignorance in respect to the national currency. In Davidson, Randolph, and Chatham counties I found among the farmers some who had heard of greenbacks before I tendered them, but had never seen any and hardly liked to receive them; they 'd been told the Government would call in all that kind of money in a year or two and repudiate; understood the traders did n't 'low 't was worth dollar for dollar; they 'd need some money, though, to pay taxes with, and Government money 'd ought to be good for that, they reckoned, for the present anyhow.

Not knowing how far confiscation measures may be pushed, they are not a little anxious to have on hand money with which to pay whatever tax-bills may be presented. Some one of the many pamphlets setting forth the country's ability to bear the burden of the national debt would be profitable reading for these North Carolinians, and I think would be willingly read. If not more necessary, the circulation of such a work would be much more easy than that of any tract purely political.

Raleigh is a less considerable city than I had supposed, and the business part of it is neither large nor handsome; but its broad avenues, abundant trees, gentle declivities, and rather elegant private residences, make it the prettiest Southern town, and with the most external evidences of taste and refinement, that I have yet seen. Its name of the City of Oaks must have been given it, I should say, by some one approaching it from the pine lands to the southward, for the number of those trees is not remarkable. The first days of October here are very enjoyable, being hazy and cool without frosts, and the moonlit nights are even finer than the days. But the air is heavy and motionless and cannot expand the chest; it brings with it a faint suggestion of decaying vegetation, and one begins to think of Carolinian slow fevers and agues.

I have been attending some sittings of the colored men's convention recently held in this city. The first steps in the matter were taken by negroes resident in Newbern, and it seems to have been generally thought by the people of the central and western counties, by such of them as took any thought at all about it, that the call was issued prematurely. They would have had it deferred until after the adjournment of the State Convention, thinking it more proper to address the Legislature in the event of the convention's leaving the colored population unnoticed. An appeal to the convention would wear the appearance of addressing itself not alone to the kindly feelings and the sense of justice of their white fellow-citizens, but partly to their fears also, and thus would provoke resentment. Moreover, the petitioners would put themselves in an attitude of complaint, when as yet they had suffered no injustice by any State action. But, on the other side, it was argued that in this State the negroes were surely suffering enough at the hands of individuals to justify them in petitioning; that in other States their brethren were suffering under unjust enactments, both ancient and recent; that in the North Carolina statutes there were evils to be cured, and there were other evils to be prevented from getting there; and, finally, with regard to the body before which the negroes' petition should be laid, that North Carolina would be more likely to slight the claims of her colored citizens after she had obtained full power to legislate for them as she pleased than now, while it is still doubtful if justice towards them may not be the lowest price at which she can purchase the enjoyment of all privileges belonging to a State in the Union. So it was decided to adhere to the original call, which was sent as far as possible throughout the country districts, and on the day of assembling nearly forty counties were represented. Some of the delegates were duly elected by meetings regularly organized for that purpose; others were sent up from churches, from prayer-meetings, from neighborhood conferences where a few men met together in secret. Of course, many were unprovided with credentials, their constituents, very probably, like themselves, being unable to read or write, and but little versed in the business of politics. "They 'd hed no time fur credentials," one said; "they 'd hed to run off in the night season fur fear;" so it was voted that the convention should be a mass convention, and all should be entitled to seats who had come up to attend. This motion, for which everybody voted, did much to take everything out of the hands of those who originated the convention, but, perhaps, made its action more truly represent the opinions and feelings of the colored people, not of the coast counties and the eastern cities, but of the whole State. For at this present time the negroes in central and western North Carolina have given but little thought to political subjects, and take no great interest in them. In Wilmington, Newbern, and Beaufort, judging by their representations at the convention, the case is different.

The session was held in the African Methodist church, a small edifice in a back street of the city. The delegates were about a hundred and twenty in number, but crowds of colored citizens were interested spectators throughout the four days, and the house was always filled full. It was neatly but cheaply furnished, the only ornament being a large plaster bust of Lincoln fix d to the wall above the pulpit, against a background of mourning drapery. Just over his head were inscribed some of the closing words of the last inaugural address—that passage which begins thus: "With malice towards none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right."

Among the delegates were some that wore the Federal uniform, and these were treated with much respect by their fellow-members. In pursuance of a fashion that seems to obtain everywhere, one of them, a sergeant, was chosen to office, and served among the vice-presidents. He, like the others, was a fine-looking young fellow, perfectly neat and clean, with every button polished, and even his face shining. "I 's black," he said; "jist as black as ary black man goin', I is."

There were several men dressed in black broadcloth, ministers and chaplains, who did a large share of the talking, and bore a main part in the management of the business, and here and there was a younger man, nattily dressed, and evidently a hotel waiter by profession or a barber; but the great majority were mechanics and plantation hands, men who had grown up in ignorance, whose forms were bent with long labor, whose faces expressed patient endurance rather than thought or any passion, and who for the most part sat mute on the benches. On two or three occasions some one of these men would rise to deprecate long discussion of things merely formal, or debate that was only personal, beginning his speech perhaps in this way: "My dear brothers, I do n't place myself in this honorable convention as a Henry Clay or a Webster, fur I know I kin not do it, nor to speak afore you. I know I 's a poor, destituted, onlarnt don't-know-A-from-B. I 's been rocked in a hard cradle, from my youth up to the present age." And then he would go on to urge the propriety of at once transacting all necessary business, so that delegates could go home, and, warming as he proceeded, he would very likely fall into the sing-song of the class-meeting, and become nearly unintelligible to those whose excitement had not kept pace with his. At the end of his remarks, however, there was always renewed diligence. But these men though ignorant were intelligent, and often spoke exceedingly well. "Yes," said one of the cleverest among them—"yes, we are ignorant. We know it. I am ignorant for one, and they say all niggers is. They say we do n't know what the word constitution means. But if we do n't know enough to know what the Constitution is, we know enough to know what justice is. I can see for myself down at my own court-house. If they makes a white man pay five dollars for doing something to-day, and makes a nigger pay ten dollars for doing that thing to morrow, do n't I know that ain't justice? They 've got a figure of a woman with a sword hung up thar, sir; Mr. President, I do n't know what you call it—('Justice,' 'Justice')—well, she 's got a handkercher over her eyes, and the sword is in one hand and a pair o' scales in the other. When a white man and a nigger gets into the scales, do n't I know the nigger is always mighty light? Do n't we all see it? Ain't it so at your court-house, Mr. President?"

There were three delegates who took very prominent positions in the convention, and who may be called leaders. One was a mulatto, born within the State, but who had received a collegiate education in the North. He was a person of some ability, but it was to his education that he owed his influence. He made many fluent speeches, and was chairman of the business committee, which reported a great many resolutions. A much abler man, one who would be considered a man of more than common ability in any community, was chairman of the committee which reported an address to the State Convention. He, I believe, is of unmixed African blood and a North Carolinian by birth. He, too, spoke often, and always with ease and force. Never attempting the passionate style of oratory which was the kind by far most frequently employed by his fellow-members, but confining himself to straightforward, sensible speaking, he pushed business forward, instructed the ignorant, attained the ends at which he aimed, and, I dare say, won the respect of every man, white or black, in the convention. But perhaps the most remarkable person among the delegates was the last of the three, a light-yellow man whose features seemed to indicate that there was a cross of Indian blood in his veins. His hair was long and black but very curly, and he appeared to be vain of its beauty as he tossed it carelessly off his forehead, or suffered it to fall heavily and half conceal his eyes. These were twinkling and slippery, and nearly always half shut, for he laughed much, and then they partly closed of themselves, and at other times he had a way of watching from under his dropped lids. He was a well-shaped man, but it was hardly to be discovered as he lolled in his seat, or from the insufferably lazy manner of his walking. When he spoke, however, he stood erect, using forcible and graceful gestures. His voice was powerful, and, though an illiterate man, his speaking was effective. But sometimes his most impassioned harangues, made for the purpose of fomenting sectional jealousies between the east and west, or to embarrass the chair, or to defeat some resolution offered by an opponent, or for the mere pleasure of contradiction, were brought to an untimely end by his inability to refrain from laughing. He was really in earnest about nothing, but his power of sarcasm and brutal invective, and the personal influence given him by his fearlessness and audacity, always secured him a hearing. It seemed to be his keen sense of the ridiculous only which prevented him from playing the part of demagogue with success. He had artfully spread dissension among the delegates by declaring it disgraceful to North Carolinians that a man from the North should have been made president of the convention. That officer, hearing of the murmurs, had tendered his resignation, accompanying the offer with a speech so judicious that the convention compelled him to retake his office. A delegate had declared that such whisperings were born in hell and should return to their place of birth; they embodied prejudices which, at the present time, in a restored and liberated country, had no place; they belonged among the bloody relics of the past. "I come forward, Mr. President," said the man I have been describing, "I come forward as not bein' one o' the whisperin' class that the gentleman has referred to. Our young Demosthenes, sir, is very polite, and shows his good breedin' to this honorable body with his invitations to his father's house. But who does he suppose is goin' to accept of 'em when he is not at home? He can talk about the bloody relics of the past, sir; but as for me, I did n't come here, and no other man of this convention did n't come here, sir, to have the whip of slavery cracked over us by no slaveholder's son." His opponent was a rather light mulatto. But the brutality of this attack is hardly so great as it seems, the standards for measuring the degree of such insults being different at the South and at the North. The speaker on another occasion announced himself as one well fitted to be a mediator between the black and white races, partaking as he did of the blood of each in equal parts, and being free from the illiberal prejudices of both. It is told of him that, once making a speech in his native town, he said this, among other things: "It 'll never do to give these niggers the ballot, they say; if they was to get it, that d—d ——— would be mayor. As if I wanted that office, gentlemen! I 'm goin' to Congress."

But the moderate men among the negroes, those who thought it best to petition and not to demand, and to petition only for equality before the law and not for admission to all the political rights of citizenship, easily obtained control of the convention. Everything that they thought could justly offend any class of their fellow-citizens at the South or North was carefully rejected. A resolution was offered which declared that if a negro knew as much when sober as an Irishman knew when drunk, he knew enough to vote on good American principles. This was thrown aside without a dissenting voice. Another one, framed with the praiseworthy intention of encouraging colored youth to educate themselves, and pronouncing it the duty of colored people to employ, whenever practicable, properly prepared pastors and instructors of their own race, became the subject of an animated debate. "I come here to stick fast to my friends," said a delegate; "the white people that done teach my little gals to read, and I 'd ha' voted to bite off a snake's head before I 'd ha' voted for that ar." The resolution was laid on the table, and a substitute was passed which thanks the Northern aid societies and Northern teachers who have done so much to encourage and elevate the negro race. The address which has been laid before the State Convention is conceived in a similar spirit and breathes nothing but moderation and conciliation. The Raleigh newspapers praise its ability, and consider it a wonderfully conservative document, undisfigured by the marks of levelling radicalism. Yet it contains these sentences:

"We desire education for our children, that they may be made useful in all the relations of life. We most earnestly desire to have the disabilities under which we formerly labored removed, and to have all the oppressive laws which make unjust discriminations on account of race or color wiped from the statutes of the State."

ENGLAND.

LONDON, Sept. 30.

SEVENTEEN years ago, cheap papers were unknown; and such an institution as that of peripatetic street news-venders was unknown also. There was indeed, no chance sale, to use a trade term, for newspapers. But, as a result of this state of things, a peculiar custom prevailed in London. Whenever news of any general interest occurred after the usual publishing hours, men with horns used to go through the less frequented streets, bawling out at the top of their voices some startling piece of news—the full, genuine, and veracious account of which they were prepared to sell for any sum they could extort from the curiosity of the public. Of late years the practice has fallen into disuse. In default of news, the horn-men took to inventing it, and organized a trick, called by a slang phrase "the cock and hen trade." Two men, for instance, would perambulate, the one shouting "Death of—a man from intoxication," and dropping his voice at the word a; the other replying—"the Emperor Napoleon—gone to St. Cloud," and likewise slurring over the words following "Napoleon." Thus people bought the paper, and yet, when they discovered their mistake, they could have no remedy, as the venders could not legally be accused of any direct fraud. But the trick, when discovered, killed the goose that laid the golden eggs; and also, as cheap evening newspapers came into fashion, the people refused to pay sixpences and shillings for extras. But, as I have said, in the year 1848, the annus mirabilis of revolution, the night news-venders were in their glory. Every day throughout that eventful summer we heard the news shouted of some throne upset, some story of the barricades, some battle, that had been won or lost. And one evening in the close of that long troubled summer, when the deluge seemed to be beginning to subside, I remember hearing the familiar shout of the newsboys approaching the quiet Belgravia street in which I then was residing. As the hoarse broken cry grew nearer, I heard the doors of neighboring houses open, and people flocked out into the streets to buy the supplement. Going myself to the window, I heard the words shrieked out in a dull, grating tone, "The cholera! the cholera! the cholera is here!" It was thus that the first tidings reached London of the disease having appeared in England; and those who learnt it in the same way as I did myself, are not likely to have forgotten the sensation.

The whole scene flashed upon my mind the other day, as it must, I should think, upon thousands of other Londoners, when taking up the morning newspapers I saw that the true Asiatic cholera was once more in England. How far the report was due or not to a false alarm is not clear as yet. This much seems certain, that a sailor died during this week at Southampton of a disease so like cholera as to deceive the doctors who attended him. Whatever one medical man with us asserts as a fact, a dozen others are always ready to dispute on "à priori" grounds; and so doctors have come forward to declare their conviction that the disease of which the man died in a few hours was not of the Asiatic type—a discovery which appears to be considered eminently satisfactory even for the unhappy man who died. Up to to-day, no other well-authenticated manifestations of the epidemic have been reported, and therefore it is not impossible the case may be an isolated instance. Whether it is so or not, there can be no reasonable doubt that the cholera is coming. The theory suggested by the Times, that it was likely to remain confined to the basin of the Mediterranean, has been upset by its recent course, and no reason can be assigned why its gradual march westward should be barred by the Straits of Dover. If we had no former experience to go by, it would be difficult to suppose the extraordinary atmospheric conditions of the season did not portend the approach of disease. The strange heats still continue, though in a somewhat abated form; and day after day we have skies as clear, if not as blue, as those of Italy. For many weeks past we have scarcely had a drop of rain, and already there are general complaints of the scarcity of water. Still, with the shortening days the nights are getting chilly, and within a few weeks, at the latest, we may expect the first touch of frost. Under these circumstances, we may fairly expect not to be fully visited by the cholera till next spring. At any rate, the public has made up its mind the epidemic will not come for another six months at the earliest; and when the British public has once made up its mind upon a theory, it takes a great number of facts to disturb its belief. A good deal may happen in half a year; and we are not much given to trouble ourselves about remote evils. Meanwhile, we have the usual outcry of the press calling on somebody to do something to make our cities more wholesome. I wish most heartily we could have six months of Imperialism to clear away the "rookeries" and slums of our great cities, and to drive broad open thoroughfares through the quarters where the fresh air can now never penetrate. But if ever we are to accomplish in England with our free institutions the work that Napoleon III. is doing in France, it will be after a pestilence, and not before it.

The cattle plague is progressing with alarming rapidity, and there is a report, though not a very clearly established one, that the "Rinderpest" has already shown itself amongst sheep. If so, the calamity will be a very serious one indeed. The idea that the malady could be trodden out, as it were, by killing every animal infected, has been much combated of late; and yet the veterinary authorities seem utterly at a loss to suggest any remedy for the disease. Just at this season all the local agricultural societies are holding their annual meetings and dinners; and, naturally enough, the Rinderpest is the one subject of discussion, to the exclusion of the old malt-tax grievance, which is now scarcely mentioned. At all these gatherings the farmers are urgent in their declarations that the Government ought to indemnify them for the cattle they kill in order to stop the spread of the plague; and some of the Tory land-owners who preside on these occasions have supported the justice of the demand. But it is absolutely certain that no such indemnity could be given without an increase in the income tax; and no ministry would dare to propose an increased income tax in order to give a subvention to any one interest, however popular. If any very general distress should ensue in the agricultural districts in consequence of this pestilence, there will doubtless be large funds raised to relieve the distress by private benevolence, and possibly a Government grant in aid; but this is all.

During the last week, the public attention has been called to the subject of electioneering expenses, and has exhibited as much interest in the matter as it is capable of feeling about anything in this dead hot season—which our purists in language are so indignant with you for describing as a "heated term." What Rabelais called the "mauvais quart d'heure" has arrived for successful candidates—the time when the bill has to be settled, and our papers are filled with the statements of expenses which returning officers are now obliged to publish according to a recent enactment. It is not to be supposed, however, that these statements represent the whole of the expense incurred, or in most cases anything like it. The agent simply returns the items which will bear inspection; but in addition to these there are a number of charges which, though not directly illegal, are still kept sedulously in the background. In our great boroughs there is no such thing as direct bribery; the constituencies are too large and too independent to be purchased. But indirectly there is a great deal of corrupt influence. A friend of mine, not long ago, was contesting one of the metropolitan boroughs on advanced liberal principles. During the course of his canvass a local solicitor called upon him, and said that he highly approved of his principles, but that, as a poor man with a large family, he was always accustomed to earn some hundred pounds for his professional services at election time, and therefore wished to know whether my friend could retain him as legal adviser. The offer was not accepted, and the attorney went over at once to the opposite camp—my informant's opponent being, I should add, not a conservative but a liberal of less advanced opinions. This instance is, I should say, the rule rather than the exception. In all our large constituencies the local lawyers and the local politicians expect to be retained in behalf of one candidate or the other. They will not desert their party unless the inducement offered be something extraordinary; but, as between men professing more or less the same liberal creed, they will invariably support the man who, in our English phrase, "sets money rolling." Nobody except the member and his committee really knows what the cost of the election is. The worst feature about the affair is, that the expenses are largest in those very constituencies where men of no local influence or moneyed interests have the best chance of succeeding as a candidate. Very great personal popularity or strong territorial connection will often enable a man to get a seat in Parliament free of expense; but the ordinary run of members have to pay terribly for the honor of writing M.P. after their names. Probably there never were two elections conducted more strictly on purity principles, or with more genuine enthusiasm on the part of the constituency, than the contests which resulted in the return of Mr. Mill for Westminster and Mr. Hughes for Lambeth. Yet the expenses of these two elections were respectively two thousand and eleven hundred pounds. This expense has been borne entirely in the case of Mr. Mill, and partially in that of Mr. Hughes, by the voluntary contributions of their several committees. But, as a rule, constituencies will not pay the expenses incurred for their candidate's return. It may be right theoretically, as Mr. Mill considers, that they should do so; but they will not do it as a rule. Anybody, therefore, who wishes to represent a London borough, must make up his mind to spend from one to two thousand pounds, supposing him to be on the popular side and to have strong local support. Failing this, his legitimate expenditure will be some five thousand or upwards; and this expense, it must be remembered, recurs every time there is an election. One of the most popular of our London members, whose seat was never in danger, and whose re-election was not opposed, stated that he had to pay a thousand pounds for his election. Nor will this calculation seem improbable when you remember that to send a circular by post to each of the electors in the borough of Lambeth, for instance, would entail an expense of at least a hundred pounds. Of course, if you stand for a small borough, the cost of the canvass is far less; but then, if you are not known to the constituency, you must spend largely in order to create a local connection. There has been a good deal of talk whether all the necessary expenses of a contest ought not to be borne by the state or by a special rate, and all expenses not so paid declared illegal. But nothing, you may be sure, will be done at present. The expense of getting into Parliament confines membership, as a rule, to the wealthy and educated class; and there is no wish on the part of our ruling classes to reduce the cost of a seat so that anybody who likes could be returned if he happens to suit a constituency.

The one striking social incident of the week has been the exodus from Greenwich Hospital. Of all the monuments of London, this river-side palace was the grandest; and sentimentalists cannot help regretting the departure of the colony of brave old tars from the walls where they lived as the pensioners of the nation. But the regret is sentimental only. For many years past, the wards of Greenwich Hospital have been comparatively empty, because retired sailors preferred living in discomfort at home amongst their own people, to living amongst strangers away from home in comparative luxury. At the noble river-side college they were well fed and clothed and housed, and kept in pocket money, but were under restraint; had to be in at fixed hours, to conform to written rules, and to submit to a discipline, lax indeed, but still obligatory. So year after year the applications for admission became fewer and fewer; till at last, with a good sense rare in our public acts, a bill was passed enabling Greenwich pensioners to draw their pensions wherever they liked, without residence being required of them unless they thought fit to prefer it. This week the new act came into operation; and all the hale and able-bodied pensioners availed themselves at once of the privilege. There is now nobody left at Greenwich Hospital except two or three hundred old men, too infirm or friendless to find a home elsewhere; and as they die out their places are not likely to be filled up. The truth is that the age of almshouses is past. Chelsea Hospital is deserted in the same way that Greenwich was, and now that we have once broken through our national reluctance to interfere with an established institution, I have no doubt many other ancient charitable foundations will be subjected to the same reform as that initiated at Greenwich.

Of Fenians or Fenianism we have heard nothing during the past week. The whole affair has missed fire in the most lamentable way, even as a "newspaper sensation;" and the chief wonder now is whether the Government will be able to justify itself for the vigor of its repressive measures. However, I doubt much stir being made about the matter even when Parliament meets. The ministry have only to look wise and say they cannot state all their reasons consistently with the interests of the country, and then no party will like to demand further information.

I hear that the publication of the names of the subscribers to the Confederate loan—particulars of which we have received this morning—has created great dismay in Printing-House Square, or, to say the least, it is not pleasant for the public to be informed that the "leading organ" of English public opinion had a direct personal, pecuniary interest in the success of the Confederacy. But on Monday we shall hear more about the matter. Waiting further information, I own it seems to me improbable so shrewd gentlemen as the editors of the Times should have taken Confederate stock in their own names, not in that of some friend or agent. Meanwhile, the rumored claims of your Government with respect to the Prioleau case have excited no attention. Our public is weary of all mention of the Confederacy, and is not inclined to quarrel about any problematic dividend from its liquidation.

A VISIT TO THE CIMBRI.

I HAD often heard in Venice of that ancient people, settled in the Alpine hills about the pretty town of Bassano, on the Brenta, whom common fame declares to be a remnant of the Cimbrian invaders of Rome, broken up in battle, and dispersed along the borders of north Italy, by Marius many centuries ago. So when the soft September weather came, last year, we sallied out of Venice, in three, to make conquest of whatever was curious in the life and traditions of these mountaineers, who dwell in seven villages, and are therefore called the people of the Sette Communi among their Italian neighbors. We went fully armed with note-book and sketch-book, and prepared to take literary possession of our conquest.

From Venice to the city of Vicenza by railroad, it is two hours; and thence one must take a carriage to Bassano (which is an opulent and busy little grain mart, of some twelve thousand souls, about thirty miles north of Venice). We were very glad of the ride across country. By the time we reached the town it was nine o'clock, and moonlight, and as we glanced out of our windows we saw the quaint up-and-down-hill streets peopled with promenaders, and everybody in Bassano seemed to be making love. Young girls strolled about the picturesque ways with their lovers, and tender couples were cooing at the doorways and windows, and the scene had all that surface of romance with which the Italians contrive to varnish the real commonplaceness of their life. Our ride through the twilight landscape had prepared us for the sentiment of Bassano; we had pleased ourselves with the spectacle of the peasants returning from their labor in the fields, led in troops of eight or ten by stalwart, white-teethed, bare-legged maids; and we had revelled in the momentary lordship of an old walled town we passed, which at dusk seemed more Gothic and Moyen-Age than anything after Verona, with a fine church, and turrets and battlements in great plenty. What town it was, or what it had been doing there so many ages, I have never sought to know, and I should be sorry to learn anything about it.

The next morning we began those researches for preliminary information concerning the Cimbri which turned out so vain. Indeed, as we drew near the lurking-places of that ancient people, all knowledge relating to them diffused itself into shadowy conjecture. The barber and the bookseller differed as to the best means of getting to the Sette Communi, and the caffetiere at whose place we took breakfast knew nothing at all of the road, except that it was up the mountains, and commanded views of scenery which, verily, it would not grieve us to see. As to the Cimbri, he only knew that they had their own language, which was yet harder than the German. The German was hard enough, but the Cimbrian! Corpo!

At last, hearing of a famous cave there is at Oliero, a town some miles further up the Brenta, we determined to go there, and it was a fortunate thought, for there we found a nobleman in charge of the cave who told us exactly how to reach the Sette Communi. The cave is like other caves as to dampness and darkness, but on the whole too Stygian in its effects to be pleasant, and I enjoyed the ride to Oliero much better. You pass a bridge to get out of Bassano—a bridge which spans the crystal swiftness of the Brenta, rushing down to the Adriatic from the feet of the Alps on the north, and full of voluble mills at Bassano. All along the road to Oliero was the finest mountain scenery, Brenta-washed, and picturesque with ever-changing lines. Maize grows in the bottom-lands, and tobacco, which is guarded in the fields by soldiers for the monopolist government. Farm-houses dot the valley, and now and then are passed villages, abounding in blond girls, so rare elsewhere in Italy, but here so numerous as to give Titian that type from which he painted.

At Oliero we learned not only which was the road to the Sette Communi, but that we were in it, and it was settled that we should come the next day and continue in it, with the custodian of the cave, who for his breakfast and dinner, and what else we pleased, offered to accompany us. We were early at Oliero on the following morning, and found our friend in waiting; he mounted beside our driver, and we rode up the Brenta to the town of Valstagna, where our journey by wheels ended, and where we were to take mules for the mountain ascent. Our guide, Count Giovanni Bonato (for I may as well give him his title, though at this stage of our progress we did not know into what patrician care we had fallen), had already told us what the charge for mules would be, but it was necessary to go through the ceremony of bargain with the muleteer before taking the beasts. Their owner was a Cimbrian, with a broad, sheepish face, and a heavy, awkward accent of Italian which at once more marked his northern race, and made us feel comparatively secure from plunder in his hands. He had come down from the mountain top the night before, bringing three mules laden with charcoal, and he had waited for us till the morning. His beasts were furnished with comfortable pads, covered with linen, to ride upon, and with halters instead of bridles, and we were prayed to let them have their heads in the ascent, and not to try to guide them.

The elegant leisure of Valstagna (and in an Italian town nearly the whole population is elegantly at leisure) turned out to witness the departure of our expedition; the pretty little blond wife of our innkeeper, who was to get dinner ready against our return, held up her baby to wish us buon viaggio, and waved us adieu with the infant as with a handkerchief; the chickens and children scattered to right and left before our advance; and with Count Giovanni going splendidly ahead on foot, and the Cimbrian bringing up the rear, we struck on the broad rocky valley between the heights, and presently began the ascent. It was a lovely morning; the sun was on the heads of the hills, and the shadows clothed them like robes to their feet; and I should be glad to feel here in New York the sweetness, freshness, and purity of the mountain air, that seemed to bathe our souls in a childlike delight of life. A noisy brook gurgled through the valley; the birds sang from the trees; the Alps rose, crest on crest, around us; and soft before us, among the bald peaks, showed the wooded height where the Cimbrian village of Fozza stood, with a white chapel gleaming from the heart of the lofty grove. Along the mountain sides the smoke curled from the lonely huts of shepherds, and now and then we came upon one of those melancholy refuges which are built in the hills for such travellers as are belated in their ways, or are overtaken there by storms.

The road for the most part winds by the brink of precipices, walled in with masonry of small stones, where nature has not shored it up with vast monoliths, and is paved with limestone. It is, of course, merely a mule-path, and it was curious to see, and thrilling to experience, how the mules, vain of the safety of their foothold, kept as near the border of the precipices as possible. For my own part, I abandoned to my beast the entire responsi bility involved by this line of conduct; let the halter hang loose upon his neck, and gave him no aid except such slight service as was occasionally to be rendered by shutting my eyes and holding my breath. The mule of the fairer traveller behind me was not only ambitious of peril like my own, but was envious of my beast's captaincy, and continually tried to pass him on the outside of the path, to the great dismay of the gentle rider; while half-suppressed wails of terror from the second lady in the train gave equal evidence of vanity and daring in her mule. Count Giovanni strode stolidly before, the Cimbrian came behind, and we had little coherent conversation until we stopped under a spreading haw-tree, half-way up the mountain, to breathe our adventurous beasts.

Here two of us dismounted, and, while one of the ladies sketched the other in her novel attitude of cavalier, I listened to the talk of Count Giovanni and the Cimbrian. This Cimbrian's name in Italian was Lazzaretti, and in his own tongue Brück, which, pronouncing less regularly, we made Brick, in compliment to his qualities of good fellowship. His broad, honest visage was bordered by a hedge of red beard, and a light of dry humor shone upon it: he looked, we thought, like a Cornishman, and the contrast between him and the viso sciolto, pensieri stretti expression of Count Giovanni was curious enough.

Concerning his people, he knew little; but the Capo-gente of Fozza could tell me everything. Various traditions of their origin were believed among them; Brick himself held to one that they had first come from Denmark. As we sat there under the spreading haw-tree, Count Giovanni and I made him give us the Cimbrian equivalent of some Italian phrases, which the curious may care to see in correspondence with English and German. Of course, German pronunciation must be given the words:

A general resemblance to German and English will have been observed in these fragments of Cimbrian, while other words will have been noticed as quite foreign to either.

There was a poor little house of refreshment beside our spreading haw, and a withered old woman came out of it and refreshed us with clear spring water, and our guides and friends with some bitter berries of the mountain, which they admitted were unpleasant to the taste, but declared were very good for the blood. When they had sufficiently improved this fluid, we mounted our mules again, and set out with the journey of an hour and a quarter still between us and Fozza.

As we drew near the summit of the mountain our road grew more level, and instead of creeping along by the brinks of precipices, we began to wind through bits of meadow and pleasant valley walled in by lofty heights of rock.

Though September was bland as June at the foot of the mountain, we found its breath harsh and cold on these heights; and we remarked that though there were here and there breadths of wheat, the land was for the most part in sheep pasturage, and the grass looked poor and stinted of summer warmth. We met, at times, the shepherds, who seemed to be of Italian race, and were of the conventional type of shepherds, with regular faces and two elaborate curls trained upon their cheeks, as shepherds are always carved in stone over the gates of villas. They bore staves, and their flocks went before them. Encountering us, they saluted us courteously, and when we had returned their greeting, they cried with one voice: "Ah, lords! is not this a miserable country? The people are poor and the air is cold. It is an unhappy land!" And so passed on, profoundly sad; but we could not help smiling at the vehement popular desire to have the region abused. We answered cheerfully that it was lovely country. If the air was cold, it was also pure.

We now drew in sight of Fozza, and, at the last moment, just before parting with Brick, we learned that he had passed a whole year in Venice, where he had brought milk from the mainland and sold it in the city. He declared frankly that he counted that year worth all the other years of his life, and that he would never have come back to his native heights but that his father had died, and left his mother and young brothers helpless. He was an honest soul, and I gave him two florins, which I had tacitly appointed him over and above the bargain, with something for the small Brick-bats at home, whom he presently brought to kiss our hands at the house of the Capo-gente.

The village of Fozza is built on a grassy, oblong plain on the crest of the mountain, which declines from it on three sides, and on the north rises high above it into the mists in bleaker and ruggeder acclivities. There are not more than thirty houses in the village, and I do not think it numbers more than a hundred and fifty souls, if it numbers so many. Indeed, it is one of the smallest of the Sette Communi, of which the capital, Asola (I spell from the Venetian pronunciation), contains some thousands of people, and lies not far from Vicenza. The poor Fozzatti had a church, however, in their village, in spite of its littleness, and they had just completed a fine new bell tower, which the Capo-gente deplored, and was proud of when I praised it. The church, like all the other edifices, was built of stone; and the village at a little distance might look like broken crags of rock, so well it consorted with the harsh, crude nature about it. Meagre meadow-lands, pathetic with tufts of a certain pale-blue, tearful flower, stretched about the village and southward as far as that wooded point which had all day been our landmark in the ascent.

Our train drew up at the humble door of the Capo-gente (in Fozza all doors are alike humble), and, leaving our mules, we entered by his wife's invitation, and seated ourselves near the welcome fire of the kitchen—welcome, though we know that all the sunny Lombard plain below was purple with grapes and black with figs. Again came from these women the wail of the shepherds: "Ah, lords! is it not a miserable land?" and I began to doubt whether the love which I had heard mountaineers bore to their inclement heights was not altogether fabulous. They made haste to boil us some eggs, and set them before us with some unhappy wine, and while we were eating, the Capo-gente came in.

He was a very well-mannered person, but had, of course, the bashfulness naturally resulting from lonely life at that altitude, where contact with the world must be infrequent. His fellow-citizens seemed to regard him with a kind of affectionate deference, and some of them came in to hear him talk with the strangers. He stood till we prayed him to sit down, and he presently consented to take some wine with us.

After all, however, he could not tell us much of his people which we had not heard before. A tradition existed among them, he said, that their ancestors had fled to these Alps from Marius, and that they had dwelt for a long time in the hollows and caves of the mountains, living and burying their dead in the same secret places. At what time they had been converted to Christianity he could not tell; they had, up to the beginning of the present century, had little or no intercourse with the Italian population by which they were surrounded on all sides. They did not intermarry with that race, and it was seldom that any Cimbrian knew its language. But now intermarriage is very frequent; both Italian and Cimbrian are spoken in nearly all the families, and the Cimbrian is gradually falling into disuse. They still, however, have books of religious instruction in their ancient dialect, and until very lately the services of their church were performed in Cimbrian.

I begged the Capo to show us some of their books, and he brought us two, one a catechism for children, entitled "Dar Kloane Catechism vor z' Baloseland vortraght in z' gaprecht von siben Komonün, un vier Halghe Gasang. 1842. Padova." The other book it grieved me to see, for it proved that I was not the only one tempted in modern times to visit these ancient people, ambitious to bear to them the relation of discoverer, as it were. A High-Dutch Columbus, from Vienna, had been before me, and I could only come in for Amerigo Vespuggi's tempered glory. This German savant had dwelt a week in these lonely places, patiently compiling a dictionary of their tongue, which, when it was printed, he sent to the Capo. I am magnanimous enough to give the name of his book, that the curious may buy it if they like. It is called "Johann Andreas Schweller's Cimbrisches Wörterbuch. Joseph Bergman. Vienna. 1855."

Concerning the present Cimbri, the Capo said that in his community they were chiefly hunters, wood-cutters, and charcoal-burners, and that they practiced their primitive crafts in those gloomier and wilder heights we saw to the northward, and descended to the towns of the plain to make sale of their fagots, charcoal, and wild-beast skins. In Asola and the larger communities they were farmers and tradesmen like the Italians; and the Capo believed that the Cimbri, in all their villages, numbered near ten thousand. He could tell me of no particular customs or usages, and believed they did not differ from the Italians now except in race and language. They are, of course, subject to the Austrian Government, but not so strictly as the Italians are, and though they are taxed and made to do military service, they are otherwise left to regulate their affairs pretty much at their pleasure.

The Capo ended his discourse with much polite regret that he had nothing more worthy to tell us; and, as if to make us amends for having come so far to learn so little, he said there was a hermit living near, whom we might like to see, and sent his son to conduct us to the hermitage. It turned out to be the white object which we had seen gleaming in the wood on the mountain from so great distance below, and the wood turned out to be a pleasant beechen grove, in which we found the hermit cutting fagots. He was warmly dressed in clothes without rent, and wore the clerical knee-breeches. He saluted us with a cricket-like chirpiness of manner, and was greatly amazed to hear that we had come all the way from America to visit him. His hermitage was built upon the side of a white-washed chapel to St. Francis, and contained three or four little rooms or cupboards, in which the hermit dwelt and meditated. They opened into the chapel, of which the hermit had the care, and which he kept neat and clean like himself. He told us proudly that once a year, on the day of the titular saint, a priest came and said mass in that chapel, and it was easy to see that this was the great occasion of the old man's life. For forty years, he said, he had been devout; and for twenty-five he had dwelt in this place, where the goodness of God and the charity of the poor people around had kept him from want. Altogether, he was a pleasant enough hermit, not in the least spiritual, but gentle, simple, and evidently sincere. We gave some small coins of silver to aid him to continue his life of devotion, and Count Giovanni bestowed some coppers with the stately blessing, "Iddio vi benedica, padre mio!"

So we left the hermitage, left Fozza, and started down the mountain on foot, for no one may ride down those steeps. Long before we reached the bottom, we had learned to loathe mountains and to long for dead levels during the rest of life. Yet the descent was picturesque, and in some things even more interesting than the ascent had been. We met more people; now melancholy shepherds with their flocks; now swine-herds and swine-herdesses with herds of wild black pigs of the Italian breed; now men driving asses that brayed and woke long, loud, and most musical echoes in the hills; now whole peasant families driving cows, horses, and mules to the plains below. On the way down, fragments of autobiography began, with the opportunities of conversation, to come from the Count Giovanni, and we learned that he was a private soldier at home on that permesso which the Austrian Government frequently gives its less able-bodied men in times of peace. He had been at home some years, and did not expect to be again called into the service. He liked much better to be in charge of the cave at Oliero than to carry the musket, though he confessed that he liked to see the world, and that soldiering brought one acquainted with many places. He had not many ideas, and the philosophy of his life chiefly regarded deportment towards strangers who visited the cave. He held it an error in most custodians to show discontent when travellers gave them little; and he said that if he received never so much, he believed it wise not to betray exultation. "Always be contented, and nothing more," said Count Giovanni.

"It is what you people always promise beforehand," I said, "when you bargain with strangers to do them a certain service for what they please; but afterwards they must pay what you please or have trouble. I know you will not be content with what I give you."

"If I am not content," cried Count Giovanni, "call me the greatest ass in the world!"

And I am bound to say that, for all I could see through the mask of his face, he was satisfied with what I gave him, though it was not much.

He had told us casually that he was nephew of a nobleman of a certain rich and ancient family in Venice, who sent him money while in the army, but this made no great impression on me; and though I knew there was enough noble poverty in Italy to have given rise to the proverb, Un conte che non conta, non conta niente, yet I confess that it was with a shock of surprise I heard our guide and servant saluted by a lounger in Valstagna with "Sior conte, servitor suo!" I looked narrowly at him, but there was no ray of feeling or pride visible in his pale, languid visage as he responded, "Buona sera, caro." Yet after that revelation we simple plebeians, who had been all day heaping shawls and books upon Count Giovanni, demanding menial offices from him, and treating him with good-natured slight, felt uncomfortable in his presence, and welcomed the appearance of our carriage with our driver, who, having started drunk from Bassano in the morning, had kept drunk all day at Valstagna, and who now drove us back wildly over the road, and almost made us sigh for the security of mules ambitious of the brinks of precipices.

UNITED STATES JOURNAL.

VOLUME ELEVENTH.

This popular Journal, which was incorporated with THE WORKING FARMER at the beginning of the war, we propose to again publish, on the Eighth day of January, 1866, in a separate form. It will be issued EVERY WEEK, and devoted to Family as well as Agricultural reading. Each number will be HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED, and contain FIRST-CLASS STORIES, wherein the prurient tendencies of modern pictorial fiction will be avoided, and a high moral tone maintained. At least eight large folio pages, more than twice the size of THE WORKING FARMER, will be filled with the best articles and items on Agriculture, Horticulture, Floriculture, Landscape Gardening, the News, etc., and thus those rural readers who are impatient with the infrequent visits of our monthly magazine will be supplied every week with the latest agricultural matter, the Prices Current, the news of the day, besides full reports of the debates of the AMERICAN INSTITUTE FARMERS' CLUB, and the literary contents, which will render the JOURNAL invaluable to the household. It will supply a place which is not filled by any paper published in the Empire City, and we solicit from the public the liberal patronage which it will be our assiduous care to merit.

It will likewise be our aim to chronicle all new inventions and improvements in the appliances of Agriculture, and present in our columns engravings of such machines and implements as promise to be permanently valuable.

TERMS—$2 50 per annum; $2 00 in clubs of ten or more. Single numbers Six cents. Specimen numbers free.

PREMIUMS.—Our terms to Canvassers for the UNITED STATES JOURNAL will be the same as to those for THE WORKING FARMER, and subscriptions for either paper will be counted in the number required for the Premiums offered in the above table. AGENTS WANTED

BY ALBERT D RICHARDSON,

N. Y. Tribune Correspondent.

1,000 COPIES SELLING PER DAY!

The most interesting and exciting book ever published, embracing Mr. Richardson's unparalleled experience for four years. Travelling through the South in the secret service of The Tribune at the outbreak of the war, with our armies and fleets, both East and West, during the first two years of the Rebellion; his thrilling capture; his confinement for twenty months in seven different Rebel prisons; his escape, and almost miraculous journey by night of nearly 400 miles. It abounds in stirring events, and contains more of the fact, incident, and romance of the war than any other work yet published. Horace Greeley says of it:

"A great many books will yet be written concerning this war, in addition to the many already in print; but not one of them will give, within a similar compass, a clearer, fuller, more readable account, entirely from personal observation, of the nature, animus, purposes, tendencies, and instrumentalities of the Slaveholders' Rebellion, than does the unpretending narrative of Mr. Richardson."

Teachers, ladies, energetic young men, and especially returned and disabled officers and soldiers, in want of profitable employment, will find it particularly adapted to their condition. Send for Circulars. Address

Crown 8vo, extra cloth, bevelled, full gilt, price $5.

From the Round Table.

One of the daintiest of forthcoming volumes is an illustrated edition of "Æsop's Fables," from the press of Hurd & Houghton, who have had it in press for a year past. Its specialty is the engravings, of which there are 111, from designs by Herrick. The majority of these consist of beasts and birds, and are among the best of the kind, if, indeed, they are not the best ever attempted in this country.

LIFE AND CHARACTER OF J. H. VAN DER PALM, D.D.,

Professor of Oriental Languages and Antiquities, also of Sacred Poetry and Eloquence, in the University of Leyden.

Sketched by NICHOLAS BEETS, D.D.

COMMENDATORY NOTICES RECEIVED BY THE AUTHOR.

From the Rev. Dr. Thomas De Witt, D.D.

There is no name held in high reputation more distinguished than that of Van der Palm. I cordially commend the proposed volume to the Christian public.

From the Rev. Alex. T. McGill, D.D.

The exposition of the text is admirable, and would be a model of great value against motto preaching in the modern pulpit. Criticism in homiletic discourse seems to have reached its perfection in Van der Palm.

From the Rev. G. W. T. Shedd, D.D.

It is a valuable contribution to literary biography and sacred rhetoric.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE new illustrated Christmas Book for 1866, got up by Messrs. Longman, and to be published here by Messrs. D. Appleton & Co., promises, from the description, to be a work of more elaborate art than we have lately seen applied to books of this nature. It is entitled, in full, "The Life of Man symbolized by the months of the year, in their seasons and phases, with Passages selected from Ancient and Modern Authors, by Richard Pigott, accompanied by a series of twenty-five full-page illustrations, and many hundred marginal devices, decorated initial letters, and tail-pieces, engraved on wood from original designs by John Leighton." The twelve sections of the work accord with the months of the year, the progress of nature from the seed to the decay of the tree, and the physical and moral development of human life. The passages culled from ancient and modern writers will be given in "the typographical characters of their respective periods," set in an elaborate frame-work of marginal devices, vignettes, etc. There are to be medallion portraits, "from the infant to the patriarch," with floral emblems, symbolical attributes, etc., etc.—in short, a wealth of pictorial illustration that, if under the guidance of good taste, may make a striking book in a class where inanity has been the general rule.

—While the Iliad receives its full tribute of translation in all Englsh metres, and in none—five new ones are readily counted up since Lord Derby's success—it is curious how totally neglected is the other masterpiece of antiquity, the Æneid of Virgil, surely the easier task of the two. This was not always the case. To try their "prentice hands" on Virgil was a favorite employment of the wits of Queen Anne's day; and it may well be doubted if Dryden's version of one author is more satisfactory than Pope's translation of the other. It is certain that their respective excellences would have been more congenially exemplified if they had changed tasks; the unquestioned fire and force of Dryden would have served him better with Homer, while Pope's finish and precision would have rather accorded with his early master and prototype, whom he imitated in his first work, the "Pastorals." A new version of the Æneid has been undertaken by that finished scholar, Professor Conington, who has edited the original for the "Bibliotheca Classica," and published translations of Horace that were warmly admired.

—There seems something of a return to the good old days—when men of real learning and distinction were well pleased to fill subordinate offices that connected them with libraries, and so served the cause of letters more effectually, perhaps, than in stations of higher pretension—in the elevation of Rev. R. Payne Smith, sub-librarian of the Bodleian, to the preferment of "Regius Professor of Divinity elect in the University of Oxford," one of the most important and dignified offices of the University. It reminds one of the time when the mighty Dr. Bentley himself did not disdain to be king's librarian, and Dr. Conyers Middleton was head of the University Library of Cambridge. Mr. Payne Smith has chiefly been before the public in connection with Syriac studies, and has edited in that language and translated "The Commentaries of St. Cyril on St. Luke," and "The Ecclesiastical History of John of Ephesus," a unique record of a stormy period of Byzantine history.

—Whoever feels annoyed at departures from minute accuracy will find plenty of cause for animadversion in the current periodical writing of England and the United States at the present day. In both countries, a desire to say smart things leads people to venture on remote allusions with an air of familiarity that only thinly covers the ignorance beneath. Perhaps the worst offender of this kind is Dr. Doran, now editor of, or at all events chief writer in, the Athenæum. In every slipshod column that he writes the characteristics just mentioned may be noticed. In the last number of the "Atlantic Monthly" a reviewer, offering corrections for Mr. Brooks's translation of Jean Paul's "Hesperus," says: "The famous African prince, Le Boo, deserves a note," a most unkindly way of turning the mild Polynesian, whose portrait, with his hair clubbed and queued in the fashion of the day, looks sadly from Keate's "Account of the Shipwreck of the Antelope in the Pelew Islands," into an African negro! It is strange, by the way, that none of our modern book translators have turned this charming book into a new "juvevile." And again, says the critic, "Incunabula means specimens of the first printed edition of a work; also, the first impressions of the first edition—the firstlings of old editions." Gustave Brunet's "Dictionnaire de Bibliologie" would tell him that the word, derived from the Latin incunabulum (cradle), was first used by the Germans to designate works produced in the infancy of the art of printing, before A.D. 1500, and has been generally adopted from them in that sense. Even in the "North American Review" a writer quotes the well-known tripartite division of mankind as into "men, women, and Lady Mary Wortley Montagus." We never heard before that any doubt was entertained as to Lady Mary's womanhood; the mot, attributed to the fast Lady Townshend, was really "men, women, and Herveys"—alluding wittily to the general eccentricities of the race, which reached almost to insanity in the famous Prince Bishop of Derry, and to the personal peculiarities of Lord Hervey Pope's "Sporus—the mere white curd of asses' milk" of the Moral Epistles.

—A work of interest to all who use "Chatham's language for their mother tongue," or are, in other words, of English descent, is in preparation by a gentleman of antiquarian name, Rev. Samuel Lysons. It is entitled "Our British Ancestors; Who and What were They? an enquiry serving to elucidate the traditional history of the early Britons, by means of recent excavations, etymology, remnants of religious worship, inscriptions, craniology, and fragmentary collateral history." The numerous local antiquarian societies now flourishing in nearly every county in the kingdom have brought together a vast quantity of facts bearing on these subjects, that only want arranging by some master's hand to bring certainty into questions that have hitherto been in too great a measure conjectural. Mr. Lyson's book will be published by Messrs. Parker, of Oxford.

—Mr. Matthew Arnold's brilliant essay, contained in his late volume, "Pagan and Mediæval Religious Sentiment," will probably make many readers acquainted for the first time with the name of the Abbé Migne. It is in comparing the meagreness and sectarian narrowness of Protestant theological literature with the all-embracing, world-wide scope of Catholic studies, as represented on the shelves of the British Museum Library, that Mr. Arnold is so greatly impressed with the gigantic proportions of the series of volumes bearing the name of that ecclesiastic. Both the man and his work, indeed, deserve to be better known, especially by all who are interested in books. The world has seen no such instance of devotion to an object, and its successful prosecution with the most limited means. The Abbé Migne was born in the first year of the present century; after embracing the ecclesiastical profession, he early showed talents that placed him in contact with the literary relations of the Church, and established in Paris in 1833 the first daily religious newspaper, L'Univers Religieux. This was only a step to the object he had at heart, and daily saw the need of—the supplying at as moderate a price as possible the means of theological study to the great body of his fellow-priests, who were too often obliged to remain in ignorance from the scarcity and high price of the books that they required. He gradually perfected the plan of a "Cours complets de la Science Theologique," and so pressing was the need to be supplied that, in a few months, he was able to depend on twenty thousand subscribers. The establishment of his vast book manufactory, "Les Ateliers Catholiques," followed, where every process necessary for the production of a volume is performed. He commenced with a complete collection of the Greek and Latin Fathers, the former to Photius (A.D. 863), and the latter to the time of Innocent III. (A.D. 1216), all from the best editions, or edited by competent scholars expressly for the work. With the Abbé's energy a few years served to complete this series in 357 volumes, which were supplied to the subscribers in a handsome imperial octavo form, averaging 500 to 600 pages, and at five francs per volume. This undertaking, which the united publishing force of Europe would have been afraid of venturing on, only stimulated the Abbé to further exertions. It is impossible to give here even the names of the different series of books that followed the "Patrologie;" among them are a "Cursus Completus" of Biblical commentaries, 28 vols.; collection of "Orateurs Sacrés" in two series, making together 102 volumes; collection of works on the evidences of Christianity, or "Démonstrations Evangéliques," 20 vols.; and the work that Mr. Arnold especially refers to, "Encyclopédie Théologique," a collection comprising in 165 volumes about eighty separate dictionaries, relating to almost every subject of archæological, literary, and scientific interest that can in its widest sense be brought into connection with Christianity. For curious and recondite information there is certainly no similar repository in existence that can compare with it. At the present time the publications kept in stock, manufactured, and often edited at the Abbé's establishment, exceed in number one thousand volumes, of high critical value and ability, all of one size, representing publishing resources that throw into the shade anything done elsewhere by individuals or societies since the invention of printing. So vast are the plans of this indefatigable man that, if he is spared a few years longer, the complete idea of his "Bibliothèque Universelle du Clergé," in two thousand volumes, will probably be successfully carried out. Visitors who feel sympathy with his objects find the Abbé a spare, hale, and active old gentleman, full of amenity, and a devoted son of the Church, which he has supplied with an armory of the faith.

—An instance of how often the purchase of a fine book, besides encouraging art and literature, may prove a good pecuniary investment, is given by the market price, at the present moment, of the original grand folio edition of Audubon's "Birds of America." The work was completed in 1840, when Baron Cuvier pronounced it "the most magnificent monument ever raised by art to natural science." A few years since copies could be procured for from $500 to $600; now $1,500 is asked for a well-bound copy, and it would not be possible to procure one of any kind for $1,200. As only one hundred and seventy-five copies were printed, and several of them have been lost or destroyed at the South, the price is certain to advance, and will shortly range as high as $2,000.

—Prof. Philip Smith has carried nearly half-way to completion his projected "Universal History" in eight volumes. The third, just published in England, brings the narrative down continuously from the creation to the fall of the Roman Empire in the west, and closes the division of ancient history. This the publisher puts forth as an independent work, which may occupy the place once filled by the "Ancient History" of Rollin. This it may do at the great marts of intellect, but in out-of-the-way places there is a good deal of life left in Rollin yet. A late New York publisher, one of the few who in former times made a fortune by his business, used to tell the story how for fifty years, whenever work was slack for the men in his printing-office, the standing order was, "Put them on Rollin," and however large the number printed, the demand was always sufficient to consume them all. It is difficult to account for the enduring popularity enjoyed by a work so diffuse and feeble, unless its sincere tone of piety had something to do with it. This will be found as noticeable in Dr. Smith's book. He writes with reverential feeling on the disputed points that often vainly agitate the minds of men who can grasp but a few isolated points of the great argument, and brings to his subjects the collected wisdom of a hundred years of critical researches since his antiquated rival wrote. The English edition is well supplied with apparatus for studying the book usefully, as maps, tables, plans of cities, etc. Messrs. Appleton, in their reprint, have added to these some staring prints of antiquities, etc., that certainly do not improve the work for the scholar's use, though they may attract the eye of the class who are to be weaned from Rollin. Their edition of volume third is in press and will speedily appear.

—A chronicle of the book taste of the day would be very incomplete that omitted any allusion to the fashion for "large-paper" copies now raging with virulence and an unhealthy disregard for pecuniary considerations among our would-be amateurs. When a book, by its embellishments or the perfection of its mechanical execution, becomes a real work of art, a large-paper copy often stands to an ordinary one in the same relation that an early proof of an engraving bears to a common impression. The least imaginative of men often delight in possessing as fine a specimen as possible of a favorite author or edition, in the same spirit that led Alexander to enshrine the Iliad in the most costly casket afforded by the spoils of Darius. The indulgence of a taste of this kind is of course not only excusable but laudable. When old stereotype-plates, however, are printed off on paper of exaggerated size, and rubbish is manufactured on the principle of a "rivulet of text running through a meadow of margin," with the express purpose of taking in the half-educated, who jump at a name without any regard to what it really should imply, the matter becomes simply ridiculous, and those whose money is obtained on such shallow pretensions deserve little real sympathy. Acquaintance with large-paper copies forms no branch of bibliography proper. They are generally treated sportively, as exemplifying the fopperies that often attach to serious studies. The greatest of modern book collectors, Richard Heber, would never admit a large-paper book into his library. The whole thing is perfectly arbitrary, reducible to no rules, and depending entirely on the fluctuations of individual fancy. The early printers, before A.D. 1500, were not accustomed to this luxury; the first well-ascertained book on large paper was the edition of Livy printed by Aldus about the year 1518. The only copy known to be preserved was bought by Lord Spencer at one of M. Renouard's auction sales for £99 15s. By far the greatest number of classical editions on large paper have no extra value on that account, but are rather regarded as lumber. There are two curious exceptions: the Hesiod, edited by Robinson, and printed at Oxford 1737, is worth, for an ordinary copy in quarto, fifteen shillings. Ten copies only were printed on largest paper, making a folio; they are worth over one hundred guineas. The last copy sold brought at an auction at Brighton, where no one was acquainted with its value, about twenty years since, two guineas and a half. It was subsequently purchased by Lord Vernon for one hundred and thirty pounds. The other instance is equally curious: Dr. Wells's edition of Xenophon, in five volumes octavo, is a very ordinary book, "neither critical nor elegant," and worth about two pounds. A set on large paper sold for £173 5s., in the Rev. Theodore Williams's library. The first folio Shakespeare on large paper would undoubtedly command one thousand pounds for a fine copy, should it now be discovered in this shape. One of the volumes most desired by American collectors is a large-paper copy of "Mather's Magnalia" (Lond. 1703). Four or five, probably, are known. They had no value in England before it was created by the demand from this country. A fine copy was bought for ten shillings at a country town in Yorkshire that has since sold for $100, and would bring more money now.

—That disappointing little dust-bin of a library at Herculaneum, which, when it was discovered, set every one agog with the hope of finding in it lost decades of Livy, and perished comedies of Menander, has been at last turned to some account by a German, Herr Gomperz. It proved to be the collection of some tenth-rate Epicurean philosopher or sophist, and contained nothing but the thinly-spun brain-cobwebs of his brethren on morals, music, medicine, rhetoric, etc., all equally uninteresting and unimportant. German tenacity, however, has grappled with the rubbish, and Mr. Gomperz has edited and printed at Leipzic, from the half-charred fragments, a work by Philodemus on logic. In it he maintains the process of investigation by induction is clearly propounded, and the essence of Bacon's reasoning on that subject anticipated.

—A book that can scarcely fail to throw some light on the little understood inner life of the East is announced by Mr. Bentley, entitled "Harem Life in Egypt and Constantinople, by Emmeline Lott, formerly Governess to the Grand Pasha Ibrahim of Egypt," a designation that sounds oddly, but probably means governess in the family of, etc. The very existence of such an infidel functionary seems rather at war with strict Mohammedan orthodoxy, and is suggestive of the present latitudinarianism, when "Selim wears a repeater, and Zuleika takes Morrison's pills."

—The great French royalist orator, M. Berryer, is employing his leisure in his country seat at Angerville in the collection and revisal of his speeches at the bar and in the Chambers, where during so many years he stood forth conspicuously as the sole champion of the elder branch of the Bourbons that represented in his eyes the principles of law and legitimacy. M. Berryer's recollections extend as far back as the trial of Marshal Ney, whose advocate he was, and will be full of interest to the forensic and parliamentary world.

—It is strange that the Hungarians—for so many centuries after the fall of Constantinople regarded as the bulwark of Christendom in the East—should turn out to be indisputably members of the same race as their opponents and assailants, the Mohammedan Ottoman Turks. As historical data on the subject were wanting, the question of Hungarian affinities has long engaged the attention of their scholars, it could only be settled by ethnology and philology, and the adventurous journey of M. Vámbéry to Bokhara, Samarcand, and Central Asia (republished by Messrs. Harper) was undertaken for this very purpose. He is considered to have proved satisfactorily the connection of his nation with the Altaic race, and rather with the Turco-Tartar section of it than the Finnic. M. Vámbéry is now engaged upon a comparative dictionary and grammar of this widely-spread idiom, furnished with which alone a traveller may make his way from the shores of the Adriatic to the great wall of China or the frozen sea of Kamtschatka—the same speech that by the western Turks has been refined into a language unequalled for copiousness, regularity of structure, and power of expressing exact shades of meaning.

—Among Messrs. Longmans' announcements one is struck with the appearance of a new edition, "revised by the author," of a book published forty-five years ago, that has long taken its place on the library shelf, and whose author we took it for granted had some time since gone to join the Humes and Robertsons of a past generation. We refer to "The History of the British Empire from the accession of Charles I. to the Restoration," by George Brodie, Historiographer Royal of Scotland. Mr. Brodie's history, dealing with the much debated men and opinions of the Commonwealth time, was conspicuous for an advanced liberalism—not so common at that day as now—that especially moved the ire of Robert Southey, some of whose idols it effectually dethroned. The new edition will appear under the title "Constitutional History of the Reign of Charles I. and the Commonwealth," and will be amended by the results of half a century's later researches.

—The changes in the condition of Spain by the introduction and development of the railroad system in that kingdom have made Mr. Ford's well-known "Hand-book" nearly obsolete, and though it will always be valued as a book of reference on all matters connected with the Peninsula unrivalled for the extent, veracity, and curiosity of its information, the tourist of the present day requires something more directly bearing upon the great questions of travelling, eating, drinking, and sleeping. All that is wanting in Ford's classical work is proposed to be supplied in a new "Guide to Spain," by H. O'Shea, just published by Messrs. Longmans. How to get from place to place; where to sleep; what to eat, drink, and avoid; the price of train and correo; the name of your landlord; the reputation of his cellar; the state of his beds; and other similar matters of personal concern, are all well illustrated in his manual. It will be welcome to many of our countrymen, with whom Spain has always been a favorite region from the days when Captain Slidell Mackenzie's "Year in Spain" first made it familiar ground to his readers. This very work was recently recommended by a correspondent of the Athenæum as "the production of Mr. Slidell of Trent notoriety," though published by Murray, and received with high praise by the "Quarterly" of the day.

—Mr. J. A. St. John, the well-known man of letters, is preparing for early publication a new "Life of Sir Walter Raleigh," based, it is said, to a considerable degree on new materials. Raleigh has hitherto not met with such a biographer as his achievements deserve. The American portion of his career of discovery yet needs, in particular, more illustration than it has ever received. Valuable matter for its elucidation has been accumulated by American scholars—as Mr. S. G. Drake, of Boston—and much relating to it will be found in the transactions of our historical societies. A life that should do justice to the great qualities of the man would be received with unusual favor. Much about him still remains in obscurity. It is a singular fact that even the fate of his descendants is not known. The posterity of his son, Carew Raleigh, can be traced to 1695, after which our information ceases, and it is not known if the family is extant or extinct. Little has been added in England to the facts collected by the laborious antiquary Oldys for his "Life of Raleigh" in the last century, but the recent opening of the Public Records to the historical enquirer leads us to expect important revelations on many of the mysterious circumstances connected with the hard treatment and fate of the founder of Virginia.

—Mrs. Browning's (Miss Barrett's) translation of the "Prometheus Bound" of Æschylus no longer remains an unequalled achievement of feminine learning. A new version of the trilogy, or three connected dramas, by the same author, "The Agamemnon, Choephorœ, and Eumenides," has just appeared, the work of Miss A. Swanwick, a lady whose début in literature was made by the performance of the task—scarcely less difficult—of translating "Faust" for Bohn's edition of the works of Goethe. The merit of this version attracted so strongly the notice of Chevalier Bunsen that he warmly recommended the Greek tragic dramas as subjects for Miss Swanwick's study. The result appears to justify his and her confidence, and her versions are generally praised for closeness to the original, and terse and forcible versification. In critical difficulties the authoress was assisted by Prof. F. W. Newman. Mrs. Browning was probably too much of an original poet to be a good medium for the transmission of another's thoughts, and Miss Swanwick has a field before her unoccupied by any competitor worthy of notice.

WHILE there have been several translations of the writings of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius into the English language, there has been but one of the writings of Epictetus. The reason is that this one was so admirable. No separate translations would have been so valuable, probably, as the four editions of Mrs. Carter's version. She was qualified for her task, not only by her fine Greek scholarship, but by her power to enter into the spirit of her author, and to reproduce his thoughts in vigorous language of her own. In presenting the works of Epictetus to the American public, nothing more was required than to compare Mrs. Carter's version with the latest edition of the original, that of Schweighäuser, published in Leipzig in the year 1800, nearly fifty years later than the edition that she used; and to make such alterations in her style as might be necessary to adapt the book to a more modern public, the literary English of a century ago not being entirely suited to the literary taste of our time. These two things Mr. Higginson has undertaken to do. The alterations in the text are few and unimportant. In that respect, the results of the editor's faithful scholarship are valuable chiefly as giving us the assurance that we have the original in its best form. Neither are the alterations in Mrs. Carter's English as many or as radical as one might have supposed would be necessary. Mr. Higginson's pages read more smoothly than hers; the obsolete words are dropped; phrases once elegant are set aside for the elegant phrases of the day. The old-fashioned garb of the version is exchanged for the easy walking dress which modern books put on, and the paragraphs move more gracefully, to our thinking. Not that all Mr. Higginson's alterations are improvements. We do not think they are. An over-refinement occasionally impairs the force of thought or of illustration. Epictetus was a slave, not excessively polished, probably, in his speech. Arrian, his reporter, was, it is true, a man of letters, and an accomplished one. The Greek is his, not Epictetus's. But for this very reason, here and there, the harsher word should be used in preference to the softer one, as best expressing the philosopher's idea. Thus we like Mrs. Carter's "wretch," "pitiful wretch," "fool," better than Mr. Higginson's "unfortunate man" and "foolish man." We like her "not to burst with passion" better than his "not to be petulant." When he substitutes for her phrase, "as if you had swallowed a spit," his own, "as if you had swallowed a ramrod," he puts into the mouth of the heathen sage a proverb which he could not possibly have uttered; a proverb too which is no more expressive than the one he employed. Indeed, to most people now, the spit would be more suggestive than the ramrod. On page 114 of the new edition we read: "Do you not know that it is the divine you feed, the divine you exercise?" Turning to Mrs. Carter we find: "Do you not know that it is a God you feed, a God you exercise?"—which is not only stronger, but more consonant with the Greek thought. "Such a one bathes in a mighty little time" has a flavor about it which "such a one bathes hastily" has not. "By nature it loves nothing but its own needs" sounds tame by the side of "No animal is attached to anything so strongly as its own interest." Here is a case where, on the score of taste, opinions may differ, but it is precisely one of the cases where we should give the preference to Mrs. Carter. She says: "Fool, sit down now and pray that thy nose may not run; wipe it, and do not murmur." Very inelegant, but very pithy. Mr. Higginson gives the same passage a more elegant, but less piquant turn, thus: "You might as well kneel and pray to be cured of your catarrh. Take care of your disease, rather, and do not murmur."

In the preface to his edition, Mr. Higginson says very justly: "Unless a new English version is to be popularized, there seems no use in making it at all." Now the chief, almost the only, defect in his version is that the style is not sufficiently "popularized." It follows too literally the Greek idiom. We marked a great many passages, of which the following are fair specimens: "It is said that there are those who will oppose very evident truths, and yet it is not easy to find a reason which may persuade such an one to alter his opinion." "Is there any likeness, then, between reading such a petition from any one as, 'I entreat you to give me permission to export corn,' and, 'I entreat you to learn from Chrysippus?'" "For by this way of reasoning it must be said." "Is it then only in the greatest and principal matter, that of freedom, permitted me to desire at random?" "When a person enquired, how any one might eat to the divine acceptance." "Nothing, perhaps, is necessary to be said to this, but that I do not want them." "What is your own, then? The right use of the phenomena of existence." "Do we not remember that no one either hurts or benefits another, but only the principles which we hold concerning everything?" Any reader can, in a moment, recast these sentences in a shape at once more natural, more intelligible, and more popular.

The book itself is deserving of all that scholarship and art can do for it. It is a most noble book. There is nothing in it that is not noble, and calculated to ennoble men and women. The tone of it is lofty and brave. It teaches, and on the very highest gounds, self-reliance, self-respect, independence of circumstances, of fortune, and of popular opinion; patience, fortitude, steadfastness, truthfulness, simplicity, temperance, purity, humility, cheerfulness, and gratitude. Its doctrine is grand without being impracticable, and firm without being hard, and rigorous without being cold. Epictetus confined himself to the sphere of personal ethics. He was not a theologian, a metaphysician, a seer, or a prophet. He dealt with no broad social questions, that interested humanity at large; those questions were not propounded in his time. His business was with the soul of each man; and he went about it in thorough earnest. The first sentence of the "Encheiridion," or "Manual," states his main doctrine:

"There are things which are within our power, and there are things which are beyond our power. Within our power are opinion, aim, desire, aversion, and, in one word, whatever affairs are our own. Beyond our power are body, property, reputation, office, and, in a word, whatever are not properly our own affairs. The things within our power are by nature free, unrestricted, unhindered; but those beyond our power are weak, dependent, restricted, alien."

This is the key-note of all the Stoical teaching; but the modulations and combinations of Epictetus are richer and sweeter than we hear from other performers on that key. Both parts of his theme, man and circumstance, are treated with a breadth and a delicacy which leave little to be desired. On the personal and human side we have words like these, which sound as if they might have been spoken by the lips of the Great Teacher:

"When you have shut your doors, and darkened your room, remember never to say that you are alone; for you are not alone, but God is within." "If the mere external image of God were present, you would not dare to act as you do; and when God himself is within you, and hears and sees all, are you not ashamed to think and act so?" "Knows he not the God within him? Knows he not in what company he goes?" "I have one whom I must please, to whom I must submit, whom I must obey, God and those who surround him. What tyrant is formidable? What disease? What poverty? What injury?"

But the individual is not placed in a sublime solitude.

"Have the very leaves and our own bodies this connection and sympathy with the whole, and have not our souls much more?" "All is full of beloved ones, first Gods, and then men, by nature endeared to each other." "What do you mean by thieves and robbers? They are people who are mistaken about good and evil. Ought you not then rather to pity than to be angry with them?" "If you call for hot water, and your slave does not hear you, or, hearing you, brings it only warm, or is not at home perhaps, is it not pleasing to God that you should abstain from anger, and should not burst with rage? Slave! Will you not bear with your own brother, who has God for his father, as being a son from the same stock, and of the same high descent?" "How does he suffer who puts his slave in chains? He suffers from the very fact of chaining him." "What is the punishment of those who do not take all things contentedly? To be as they are. Shall we throw such an one into prison? What prison? He is in prison already."

Almost the words of St. John. "This is the condemnation that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light."

A popular cyclopædia, under the head of Epictetus, declares that "the Stoics demonstrated a providence, but their providence was destiny." We take it that every man's providence is destiny. The question is, in what attitude does he stand before it? Is he passive or active? Has he emotions toward it, or not? Does he recognize allegiance to it, profess gratitude and love for it, submit to it like a child? or does he stand dumb and frigid, passionless and purposeless, in its presence? The practical sentiment and feeling colors the belief, and makes it to be either fatalistic or filial. The belief of Epictetus was filial; he was not a fatalist, for he praised and loved, and cheerfully served. Here is a passage on page 50:

"Ought we not, both in public and in private, incessantly to praise the Deity, and rehearse his benefits? Ought we not, whether we dig, or plough, or eat, to sing this hymn to God: Great is God, who has supplied us with these instruments to till the ground! Great is God, who has given us hands and organs of digestion; who has given us to grow insensibly, and to breathe in sleep? These things we ought for ever to celebrate, but to make it the theme of the greatest and divinest hymn that he has given us the power to appreciate these gifts, and to use them well. What else can I do, a lame old man, but sing hymns to God?" "Fool! would you have anything but what is best? And what is best, but what pleases God?" "Lift up your head like a man free from bondage. Dare to look up to God, and say, 'Make use of me for the future as thou wilt. I am in communion with thee; I am one with thee. I refuse nothing that seems good to thee. Lead me whither thou wilt; clothe me in whatever dress thou wilt.'" "If a man eats judiciously, gratefully, handsomely, temperately, and decently, must he not eat acceptably to God?"

There is no such thing with Epictetus as pure evil.

"What figure think you Hercules would have made if there had been no lion, or hydra, or stag, or unjust and brutal men to be expelled and cleared away? He must have wrapped himself up and slept." "Reason is not measured by size or height, but by principles." "Where our interest is, there too is our piety directed."

The following passage about death contains the highest teaching we know: "Since, at all events, one must die—at what employment would you have death find you? For my part, I would have it to be some humane, beneficent, public-spirited, noble action. If death overtakes me in such a situation, it is enough if I can stretch out my hands to God and say, 'I thank thee that thou hast brought me into being. I am satisfied with the time that I have enjoyed the things which thou hast given me. Receive them back again, and distribute them as thou wilt; for they were all thine, and thou gavest them to me.'" And again, on p. 399: "Never say of anything, 'I have lost it;' but 'I have restored it.' Has your child died? It is restored. Has your wife died? She is restored. Has your estate been taken away? That, likewise, is restored. 'But it was a bad man who took it.' What is it to you by whose hands he who gave it hath demanded it again? While he permits you to possess it, hold it as something not your own, as do travellers at an inn."

These are high teachings. Some of them run closely parallel with the sublimest precepts of the New Testament. And they were uttered in the first century of the Christian era, before Christianity had been proclaimed much abroad. They were delivered by a Phrygian who lived in Rome, at first as a slave, afterwards as a freedman—who, banished from Rome, retired to Nicopolis, a city of Epirus, and taught philosophy there. He may possibly have heard St. Paul preach in the Forum or at the palace; but not a word in his discourses, however closely they may resemble those of the apostle in some of their ideas, betrays the smallest acquaintance with him or his Gospel; nor does a single passage reflect, ever so faintly, the thoughts that were always uppermost in the apostle's mind. There is no hint of his central doctrines or of his distinctive doctrines; no trace of the influence of his mind or character. There is nothing in these writings of Epictetus that may not have been his own—the product of his own philosophical principles. We may regard them as a pure product of the Greek mind in its finest mood. Of course there are many things wanting, that we miss. There is no confession of the Christ; there is no clear belief in immortality. But how noble must the man have been who reached so lofty a pinnacle of goodness and faith without the aid of hopes that seem to us so all-important! "Some men," said Mr. Beecher once, "can do more with a jack-knife than others can with a whole chest of tools."

How well Epictetus lived up to his own doctrines, we do not know with certainty. He was simple in his habits and frugal in his way of life; his companions in his later years were a child whom he adopted because its parents abandoned it, and the woman whom he employed as nurse for the child. Origen preserves an anecdote of him which, if true, proves him a man who "recked his own rede." When Epaphroditus, his brutal master, put his leg in the torture, the slave quietly remarked: "You will break my leg." Presently the bone crushed, whereupon the slave, in the same tone, added: "Did I not tell you so?"

THE LONDON TIMES ON THE AMERICAN WAR.*

This is one of the wittiest, keenest, and most incisive of all the brochures called forth by the war. The writer, we believe, is Mr. Stephens, one of the Saturday Reviewers, and, if we mistake not, the author of the "Essays on Social Subjects" reprinted from that journal. All other attempts that have been made to punish the London Times for its blunders, inconsistencies, and dishonesty during the war, bear about the same relation to this one that a flint-headed spear bears to a Toledo rapier. As regards manner, it might be put into the hands of any beginner as a model in the art of attack. Every line is marked by that restrained and disciplined strength, that suggestiveness, which, while saying much, leaves on the mind of the reader the impression of great forbearance on the part of the writer, which constitute the highest excellence in political writing, and are, in fact, whenever they characterize the whole literature of a country, one of the surest indices of a high state of culture. But they are not characteristics of either English or American journalism. The amount of reliance which, in the newspaper writing of both countries, is still placed on what might be almost called mere screaming, in epithets, interjections, and reckless assertion, is lamentable. Matthew Arnold calls it the "brutality" of journalism, borrowing his term from the French, amongst whom the art of writing finely, delicately, keenly, but nevertheless cuttingly whenever necessary, on the topics of the day, and for hasty consumption, has been carried to a pitch of perfection from which it is still far distant amongst us or the English.

Mr. Stephens reviews the whole course of the Times on American affairs since 1861, its utterances on the causes of the war, its comments on the progress of the struggle, its predictions as to its results, and its correspondence from New York; and more entertaining reading of the kind it would be difficult to light upon. Some of the hits are exceedingly happy, as when he compares the attempts of the "leading journal" to show that slavery had nothing to do with the rebellion, to the efforts of a looker-on at a cricket match who should adopt the theory that the ball had nothing to do with the game to account for the movements of the players. Nothing can be more amusing than his criticism of the ridiculous homilies it preached on the conduct of the Americans from "the 'philosophical bystander' point of view."

In November, 1860, the Times declared that "the South, even if united, could not resist the North for three months." In April, 1861, it hopes that "the certain failure of attempts at coercion will be discovered by the Washington Government soon enough," etc. In May, it pronounced the reduction of the seceding States an "inconceivable idea." In July, it favored Southern independence as the issue in which, "after infinite loss and humiliation," the contest must result. In August, it was still more confident. In January, 1862, it said "there were nine millions on the side of the South," and eight millions wavering in the border States. During the summer it proved that the blockade was impossible, and the attempt to enforce it would only "slightly raise the price of cotton." In January, too, it allowed two months for the further duration of the war. In March, it complained that its calculations had gone wrong owing to "the unexpected and astonishing resolution of the North." In May, it said the Federals had "established an ascendency in the field," and that "the whole story was a mystery." In June, it declared "the superior numbers and resources of the North as certain in the end to prevail." In July, it recovered itself after McClellan's defeat, and for two years and a half prophesied steadily in the old direction. In September, 1862, it pronounced the talk of putting down the rebellion "mere verbiage." In January, 1863, it predicted that the "North would soon see the enterprise was hopeless." In March, it declared that "they might as well try to save the Union as the Heptarchy." In May, it told "these poor drowning wretches (the Unionists) that they had no chance whatever," and should "bow low like children to the teaching of the right." "The poor wretches," says Mr. Stephens, "would not drown, but the Times was not disheartened." He gives many pages of this sort of thing, accompanied by comments of his own. The following is a good specimen of the way in which he scarifies his victim:

"The great mass of prophetic matter in the Times thus implied a false conception of the facts. But it was incapable of even holding steadily to one conception. Before the war began, and in the spring of 1862, its prophecies were diametrically opposite to its prophecies at most other periods. In the spring of 1864, it was neutral. The Times in 1860 anticipated Mr. Seward's prophecy that the North would conquer the South in ninety days. In 1861, it prophesied that the North would abandon its attempts in sixty days. And (November 4, 1862) it endorsed Mr. Jefferson Davis's assertion that the war could be carried on in Virginia for twenty years after the capture of Richmond. Mr. Seward was wrong, and Mr. Davis was wrong: the Times had the curious felicity of combining both blunders."

Of the course of the Times as to the connection of slavery with the war, the writer says:

"The Times had thus asserted within a year that 'slavery was the cause of the war;' that 'slavery was one cause and protection another;' that 'slavery was the cause and protection a pretext;' that 'slavery had little to do with the war, and protection much;' that 'it could be all but demonstrated' that slavery had nothing to do with it at first, and 'quite demonstrated' that slavery had since passed out of sight; that 'some people thought' that 'abolition was at the bottom of the whole business, and that it would very probably be the result;' and that 'slavery was the reel on which the coil was wound,' though not the material of which the coil was made. In other words, the Times knew nothing about it."

AFRAJA.*

It is too late to offer criticism of a book like this, which so many have read with unmixed delight. Indeed, Afraja is one of those books which fix for themselves, and at once, the place which they are destined to keep, and perhaps at the first the critic of this romance could have done little more than exult in it, and offer the homage of undivided praise to the interest of its narrative, the beauty of its style, and the unfailing purity, simplicity, and sweetness of its feeling. At any rate we can now have no other office.

The reader doubtless remembers too well to require rehearsal from us the story of the young Danish nobleman who goes to Norway from Copenhagen to seek his fortune among the stormy scenes and stormy men of that wild northern land; how he relinquishes, on the suggestion of the crafty old merchant, skipper, and fisherman, Neils Helgestad, his purpose of taking possession of lands given him by royal letters, and turns trader; how his good heart and clear head make him hateful to the hard, money-getting race with which he has cast his lot; how his pity for the miserable Lapps (whom the Norwegians in the first half of the last century hated and misused with more than our despite for the negro) brings him at last into trouble and implicates him in the charge of treason made against their old chief, Afraja; how he is saved by the friend whom Neils Helgestad tried to murder; how in the end he marries Helgestad's beautiful good daughter, Ilda, when all the hard old man's schemes have crumbled into the reveries of dotage; and how he lives and dies a happy and honored man in the Norwegian home he has chosen. But fine as the story is, it is but a minor charm of the book, in which there is the closest study and sharpest delineation of the character of the men and nature of that melancholy region where the scenes are laid. The fresh, cold, salt winds of the teeming northern seas blow through the book; the brief, lovely summer of that climate brightens it; the wild and terrible splendors of its winter are there; the descriptions of nature are as novel and unhackneyed as the narrative and the characters. It seems to us that the author does not once fail in any part of the work; and we can well believe that such types of character as he painted are still, as he told Mr. Bayard Taylor, to be found in the Loffoden Isles.

All that rude life of fishing, and hunting, and trading, and combat with the loth elements for existence, is conjured before the reader, and while he peruses the book the people in it have a substance and reality absolutely unknown to the characters of any other fiction of this class. The old chief, Afraja, who lives withdrawn among the bleak hills with his people, and only meets the Norwegians to sell them spells which his sorcery has invented against evil weather, has just that measure of fanaticism, ferocity, and goodness which belongs to the savage. His daughter—whose hapless love for the Dane is the most pathetic sorrow of the book—the poor, gentle little Gula, is drawn with the sweetness, and tenderness, and passion proper to a nature reclaimed from barbarism by her long association with Helgestad's family, but full yet of the strong impulses of her savage childhood. Helgestad's light-hearted, ill-starred son, Björnome, who loved Gula as hopelessly as she loved the Dane, and Helgestad's daughter, Ilda, are both own children of that calm, balanced, and strong-willed man, in whom respect and liking for his victim, the Dane, struggle hard to the end with his greed of gain and his purposes of treachery. Ilda is, indeed, a wonderful creation, and might stand for the type of the clime in which she was born. Her beauty is the beauty of the north—rugged and almost stern in its splendor; her love is warm as the summer, which at last breaks fervently from the heart of the north; her truth is endless as the summer day. She is infinitely good; her whole nature is bent to tenderness and pity, but she is so well controlled that it all seems the effect of studied principle in a soul ignorant of impulse.

Altogether, the book is one of unspeakable charm, as many people must know, since the present translation has passed to a seventh edition. It enriches a literature poor in fiction, and it is the best romance of its class in German—perhaps in any language. The translator has performed an ever-thankless task with admirable fidelity and spirit, which is the limit set to the performance of translators. To those who do not read "Afraja" in the original, his work is a priceless favor; and even to the reader of German it is inoffensive, which, we dare say, has been mentioned before. Occasionally there is a lapse from the general excellence of the translator's English, as where he says that in a certain harbor so many ships could lay; and what does he mean by "an unexpected surprise?"

Harper's Hand-book for Travelers in Europe and the East. By W. Pembroke Fetridge. Fourth edition. (Harper & Bros., New York. 1865.)—The close of the civil war has given a very strong impetus to the travel from this country to Europe. The steamers of the popular European lines have all been crowded, since the fall of Richmond, to the utmost of their capacities. The number of trans-Atlantic travellers in pursuit of pleasure and business during the spring and summer months of this year is estimated by the tens of thousands. Most of our native wanderers across the Atlantic are possessed only of the most general information as to the geographical, political, and social relations of England and the Continent, and more or less ignorant of the modes and proper direction of European travel. It is not surprising, therefore, that there is a very lively demand by them for books which promise to give them the enlightenment upon these subjects needed for a profitable and pleasurable enjoyment of a visit to the Old World.

Mr. Fetridge's compilation, the fourth annual edition of which is before us, meets this demand measurably, but not by any means fully. We do not doubt that it is finding a ready sale. But this is due to the fact that it has no competitor in this particular field of literature on this side of the Atlantic, and that it temptingly claims to embody in one, comparatively cheap, volume all the necessary information that can be found otherwise only in the very high-priced volumes of Murray, Baedecker, and other European vade mecum publishers, rather than its own intrinsic worth. During a late tour of the Continent, we had occasion to bring its relative value to a practical test, and found that its shortcomings balance, if not outweigh, its merits. And this is the opinion of all the intelligent, educated, and observing American travellers whose criticism of the book we heard expressed. We do not deny its usefulness to that numerous class who make the greatest possible amount of sight-seeing in the least possible time their principal aim. Those bent upon "doing up" Europe in as many months as might be profitably devoted to a single city, will be satisfied with mere cursory views of the several countries they pass through, and with skipping lightly from one object of interest to another, and to them "Harper's Hand-book" will furnish all the guidance required. But to those who seek a more thorough acquaintance with the material and intellectual condition of the Old World, and are intent upon instructive studies of the various phases and manifestations of European life, a brief use of it will soon disclose its inadequacy.

The imperfections of this guide arise from its too comprehensive scope. In an octavo volume of less than six hundred pages, the collator attempts to embody all that is desirable for the American traveller to know of Great Britain, of all the Continental countries, of Egypt, Syria, and Palestine. The vastness of the material naturally involves a corresponding condensing process, which renders a superficial and incomplete treatment of the several subjects unavoidable. With fixed limits of space, what to omit was as important a question with the compiler as what to include in his work. It is, however, but just to say that he has done the best he could under the circumstances as to the amount of the matter incorporated. Still, not one of the countries touched upon receives anything like an exhaustive notice. Some of those most stingily treated are among the most attractive to American travellers, as, for instance, Germany, to which but twenty-four pages are devoted, while Spain is given fifty. The briefness of the chapters devoted to Russia and the Scandinavian countries borders on the ridiculous. The arrangement of the contents is good, and the information given as to routes of travel, means and time of intercommunication by land and water, character of hotels, expresses, etc., etc., accurate, with few exceptions. A certain flippancy of criticism of works of art offends good taste, and is not apt to impress the reader with a very high opinion of the compiler's fitness as a judge. The historical synopsis with which each country is introduced to the traveller might be properly dispensed with. The accompanying railway map is all but worthless. That portion of the work in which the United States is hastily disposed of is both out of place in a foreign guide-book, and so marred withal by errors of fact and even more censurable faults, that it must impair the confidence reposed by any American in the statements which he cannot test as here out of his own knowledge and experience. It were best entirely erased, and its space distributed where it legitimately belongs.

In the preface to the fourth year, much improvement is claimed for the new edition. We are unable to discern any but trifling changes. In the preface of the preceding edition, Mr. Fetridge lays claim to originality of compilation. This we take the liberty to dispute. A comparison of his book with the popular European hand-books will readily reveal the main sources of his material. In conclusion, we beg to suggest to him and his publishers that, the pecuniary success of their enterprise being now assured, they could well afford to banish from its pages the undisguised puffs of hotels, tradesmen, and shopkeepers which forbid any pretence of disinterested advice.

Religious Worship, considered under its economic aspects. By a Colombian. (A. H. Baily & Co., London.)—This pamphlet, published in English and Spanish, is before us; and it is a remarkable production, from the pen of that illustrious South American, General Mosquera. The object of it is to prove that religious liberty, pure and simple, has a direct tendency and agency in promoting public wealth. The author directly disclaims any reference to the subject in other points of view, and treats it only as a question of political economy. His style, too, is strictly adapted to the end, being terse, clear, and concise to an extreme. Having had long personal experience in the practical treatment of the questions of religious liberty as a legislator of Colombia, three times president of the republic, and a triumphant general in wars for its defense, and recently the promulgator of the decree repealing mortmain and reducing the recusant and rebellious clergy to submission to the constitution and laws, his arguments and opinions come before the world with much greater authority than those of a merely speculative writer. It will excite surprise, if not admiration, to find in this production a new proof of the versatility of Gen. Mosquera's acquirements and talents, for it is very rare to find, in any age and country, a self-educated man so highly distinguished in practical science, military, civil, legislative, and diplomatic life. He is now Colombian Minister to England, Prussia, and Italy, and President elect for the fourth time.

As a sample of his argument, we quote two paragraphs from pages 10-11, which follow a description of the preference of certain countries for a monopoly of "religious production:"

"From this monopoly it results that real estate or unmovable properties acquired by the Roman, Greek, and Anglican churches, and which they have an interest in augmenting in order to secure their existence and means of action more and more firmly in the future, become inalienable in their hands, and are withdrawn from circulation. Not only do they pass from the possession of the lay community, but are in perpetuity diverted from their ordinary scope of operation, and abstracted from that commercial movement which, under the impulses of private interests, gives activity to the development of productive resources, rendered the more profitable by general interest, in causing them to circulate amongst those most apt to reap the greatest advantage therefrom. This first consequence produces another still more deplorable.

"If the Roman, Greek, and Anglican ecclesiastical hierarchy had to depend upon periodical contributions and accidental offerings voluntarily given to them by the lay community for the satisfaction of their personal necessities and those connected with the forms of worship over which they preside, they would have an interest for the purpose of exercising their monopoly in stimulating the zeal of believers, and in maintaining amongst them religious sentiments and habits. Can this be the case with the above-mentioned churches, possessing as they do considerable properties and estates which render them independent of the zeal of the faithful? Manifestly not; the stimulus of interest is weakened, then, if it has not entirely disappeared; and as the stimulus of duty is not, unfortunately, of constant efficacy, we may with certainty conclude that under such a system the provision for the religious necessities of the orthodox or Anglican Catholics will become more and more imperfect and insufficient."

Poetical Tributes to the Memory of Abraham Lincoln. (J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia.)—A few of the poems collected in this volume from the newspapers merit the preservation they here receive. The bulk, of course, do not. The connection between great national events, or popular emotions, and numbers, is curious if somewhat occult. It is a fact, even though there be no explanation for it, that a gushing of commonplace thought into weak verse is invariably produced in the community at large whenever its feelings are stirred out of common, so that it almost becomes necessary to apologize for speaking in prose. That the majority of the poor performances which abound on these occasions only indicate how many poetasters are lying in ambush for the auspicious moment that is to ungag them, we have no doubt. But yet we would not wholly deny to so wide-spread an impulse the divine afflatus, nor refuse to believe that there was in many instances a spiritual compulsion to write, and to write in verse. And we can readily regard the writers of these tributes to Mr. Lincoln as controlled by the same irresistible spell that bowed the heart of every citizen with sorrow. But as with the material symbols of this sorrow, so with the poetical tributes—each one displayed according to his means and according to his taste; and as the lamented subject of both, if he was conscious of a nation's mourning, accepted the humblest badge along with the costliest, so the sincerity of these utterances must have outweighed with him their defective form. The book has a value analogous to that of the sermons of the day which have also been published. They will help the student and the historian hereafter to form a tolerable idea of the state of the public mind at the time of the assassination.

Curious Facts in the History of Insects. By Frank Cowan. (J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia.)—Beetles, grasshoppers, ants, bees, moths, flies, lice, scorpions, and spiders, are the principal subjects of this singular compilation, intended by the author to increase the interest of entomological studies, by attaching to as many insects as possible some extra-scientific fact. It is really surprising how many superstitions and traditions exist the world over in regard to the creatures here considered, whose importance in the materia medica of more ignorant times is one of the most interesting branches of Mr. Cowan's investigations. Perhaps it is not safe to ridicule all the whimsical specifics which have been popularly drawn from the insect world, though most of them are not more rational or savory than the ingredients of the hell-broth in the witches' cauldron. Even at the present day, we are assured, "the bed-bug is sometimes given by the country people of Ohio as a cure for the fever and ague." The opening topic of the book, lady-birds, is treated luminously, and will secure the attention of every reader, for they are surely few from whose experience this pretty bug has been omitted. Yet its wealth of titles—in English alone, "Bishop Barnabee," "Lady Lanners," "Dr. Ellison," "King Calowa"—the verses of many lands in its honor, and its high repute as a true-lover detective, do not save it from the medicine-chest, where it was once prized as an efficacious remedy for the colic and measles, and may still, perhaps, be found as a cure for the toothache when compressed into the hollow.

The Backwoodsman; or, Life on the Indian Frontier. Edited by Sir C. F. Lascelles Wraxall, Bart. (Boston: T. O. H. P. Burnham. New York: Oliver S. Felt.)—The adventures of a pioneer whose "block-house was built at the foot of the mountain-chain of the Rio Grande, on the precipitous banks of the River Leone," have perhaps greater interest for Englishmen than Americans. We confess that we find all books of backwoods life so much alike in their incidents as to be a little tiresome. The pertinacity with which pioneers, in this species of literature, hunt buffaloes, kill bears and panthers, trap beavers and fight Indians, is not relieved in any way that we can see in the present work. We do not observe anything new concerning wild nature and wild men in it, and we doubt if the sang froid and frequency with which Sir C. F. Lascelles Wraxall's backwoodsman butchers Indians will improve the tone of the youthful stomachs in which his adventures will probably be for the most part digested. The book is no worse in other respects than others of its sort. We believe that on first looking into it we felt some slight desire to be told by the editor who the backwoodsman was—to have him in some way proved and identified—but we doubt now whether we wish to know more of him than we learn from the book.

Poetry of the Age of Fable. Collected by Thomas Bulfinch. Boston: J. E. Tilton & Co.—Some years ago, Mr. Bulfinch wrote a pleasant book called "The Age of Chivalry," in which he recounted many of the old British legends of King Arthur and his knights, and he followed this book with another called "The Age of Fable," which, he says, "was an attempt to convey so much knowledge of the gods and goddesses, heroes and heroines, of antiquity, as a well-educated gentleman or lady of the present day has occasion for." In carrying out this genteel purpose, Mr. Bulfinch had frequent occasion to quote from the classic and modern poets verses touching mythological subjects; and the present volume presents "these poetical citations and illustrations increased in number and in length."

The reader may judge of the felicity of Mr. Bulfinch's idea in producing the book. We are sorry to say that we find the prettily-printed collection a very dreary one; and that most well-educated ladies and gentlemen will find themselves already acquainted with the memorable verses cited, and will have little wish to read the rest.

Our Artist in Cuba. Fifty Drawings on Wood. By Geo. W. Carleton. (Carleton, New York.)—The artist-publisher might have dispensed with the "many misgivings" with which, he tells us, he was persuaded to give permanence and publicity to the careless sketches of his pocket-book. He exhibits a nice sense of the ludicrous with a very creditable command of his pencil. The subjects not delineated for their humor, such as buildings and landscapes, are especially remarkable for effectiveness of touch, and bear the impress of fidelity to the original scenes. The text is neither a necessary, nor in most cases a helpful, adjunct of the drawings, and would be improved by omitting an occasional vulgarism.

Lyrics of Life. By Robert Browning. (Ticknor & Fields, Boston.)—This volume continues the illustrated series entitled "Companion Poets for the People," in judicious imitation of continental, and especially German, publications of a similar character. The form is handy, the typography and paper excellent. The illustrations are rather indicative of merit than meritorious. The lyrics embrace some of the most famous and perspicuous of Mr. Browning's poems, with many short pieces of great beauty.

The North American Review. (October.) The present number is an unusually good one, inasmuch as there may be said of it what can rarely be said of quarterly or monthly, that it does not contain a single article which can fairly be called "padding," though one or two are wanting in that very useful quality of periodical writing which, for want of any better name, we shall call "freshness." "The Political Opinions of Jefferson" is an able analysis of Jefferson's character, in which what is now seen to be erroneous in his opinions, or mischievous in his influence, is traced to the effect on him of the individualistic philosophy of the Locke school, by which all his political ideas were permeated. A curious illustration of his defects as a statesman is furnished by the fact on which the reviewer comments, that he looked with distrust on all forms of industry except agriculture, knew nothing of trade, commerce, or finance, had a mysterious dread of credit, and viewed merchants with great suspicion.

The article on "John C. Calhoun" is a somewhat extended biographical sketch, accompanied by a commentary on his writings and political opinions. As an essay, it is less acute than the preceding one on Jefferson, but is more interesting. Like all that Mr. Parton writes, it is very vivid, and it gives us a picture of great distinctness. There was probably nothing in Calhoun's career more singular than that a man of his puritanical cast of character should have held that absolute sway over a society so little puritan in all its leading incidents as that of the South, unless it be that Southern society should have produced him. His narrowness, thoroughness, intensity, bigotry, personal purity, went to make up a style of man which we should never expect on à priori grounds to find representing South Carolina.

"Study of Language, or Physical Science," is an able and instructive review of Max Muller's last book, and deserves careful perusal at the hands of everybody interested in the subject, and there are but few persons of culture who, nowadays, are not. The article on "Belligerent War Vessels in Neutral Ports" is a clear and careful exposition of the rules of international law which the late war has either originated or confirmed or elucidated. We have no hesitation in saying that, in style and temper, impartiality and candor, it far surpasses anything that has appeared on the same subject on either side of the Atlantic, and although its advocacy of the American side of all disputed points is strong and pronounced, it will, if read in England, as we hope it will be, produce a decided impression.

Mr. Norton's "American Political Ideas" is a strong statement of the principles on which our political and social system is based, and he deduces from them an obligation incumbent on the Government to carry them out in the re-organization of the South. We have seen these views characterized in an otherwise able critique of the number as "New Englandish," with an insinuation that they would not find currency in any other part of the country—which, if true, simply proves the necessity of preaching them.

The literary notices, as usual, are good, and contain not only criticism but good criticism.

The Atlantic Monthly for October is uncommonly like The Atlantic Monthly for September. "Saints who have had Bodies" is a reply to Mr. Higginson, showing that mental activity increases vitality, and that mental progress in modern times "has not been purchased at the expense of the physical frame." "The Author of Saul" is a pleasant notice of Charles Heavysege. "John Jordan" is an exciting sketch of a Southern Union scout by Edmund Kirke. Mr. Longfellow's "Noel," verses in quaint French, addressed to Mr. Agassiz, with a basket of wine, last Christmas, are the gem of the number. Mr. Wasson continues his review of "Wilhelm Meister." Another chapter of "Dr. Johns," and a long poem on Abraham Lincoln, by Brownell, make up the number.

Harper's Monthly has a decidedly military flavor. Three of the five poems were inspired by the war, and are matched by an equal number of prose articles—one consisting of extracts from Major Nichols's "Story of the Great March;" another being Gen. Jordan's remarkable exposure of Jefferson Davis's incapacity as Commander-in-chief of the Confederacy, from the point de vue Beauregard; and the third, a paper on "Fighting Joe Hooker" by a very partial admirer, who attributes the general's difficulties to his being by nature nothing if not critical. The rest of the number contains the usual variety of fiction, and a characteristic article on the cinnabar mines of New Almaden.

MR. WARD'S INDIAN HUNTER.

LAST week we spoke of the excellent portrait bust of Doctor Dewey. This week a more important work of the same artist claims attention, the group which has been for a few days past on exhibition at Mr. Snedecor's gallery. The subject is a young Indian of one of the North-western tribes, "still hunting" with his wolfish-looking dog by his side. The figures are somewhat larger than life; the man would perhaps be eight feet high, were he to stand erect.

The hunter is a young man in the prime of life. He is advancing with long, stealthy strides, his body bent forward, and his eyes intently fixed on the game. His left hand is held up close under the left breast and shoulder, and in it he grasps his short bow and one arrow. With his right hand he holds, by a leash, his eager dog, checking him, the leash passing around the clenched hand that grasps it. He is naked, except that a piece of buffalo skin is knotted around his waist and falls about to mid-thigh.

This group is in plaster of Paris, evidently a cast from the clay model. A plaster cast fares badly on public exhibition. The material is the most ungrateful that can be used for works of sculpture. The clay of which models are made is beautiful in comparison, its color is better than the opaque white of the gypsum, and the slight gloss of its constantly wet surface is just sufficient to prevent the shadows from being too gloomy. It would be in vain to paint the plaster the same color as the clay: that would only make it worse, for it is not whiteness but opacity that is wrong. Moreover a painted surface is an ugly surface, where one color of oil paint is applied, and there are practical objections to the use of water color as in fresco. We must take our statue in white plaster, until the artist cuts it in marble or casts it in bronze. Then it certainly gains a new charm, from the semi-translucency and beauty of surface of the marble, or from the subdued lustre and sharp, emphatic shadows of the bronze. The plaster cast "fares badly," we have said above, because it does not attract. But perhaps sculptor of noble ambition and proper self-confidence ought not to object to show his work in this unpleasing material, its true merit as a work of art can be so accurately estimated—the dull white surface, neither transmitting light nor reflecting it in flashes, shows minutiæ of form so accurately. The sculptor ought not to be unwilling to let the people see his work in this unbeautiful guise, for they ought to learn to judge of pure form and to love it.

The noblest form, that of the human body, is the worthiest subject for sculpture. The true form of man, that is the matter of the sculptor's study. God made the body, and man made the clothes. But modern art is weak and slow when it tries to represent the naked body. Our modern statues look undressed, is not an uncommon complaint; that nakedness which is unconscious of clothes, they do not have. You cannot imagine clothes upon the Theseus, nor even upon the Day and Twilight of the Laurentian sacristry; but modern fisher-boys and Cupids and other naked figures seem to need Mr. Dick's prescription in David Copperfield, "Let him be measured for a suit of new clothes directly." Well, if statues look undressed, is it not because the models were so? People who wear modern clothes all the time are not good "studies of the nude." If any sculptor wants to revive his art again, he must study people who are not unaccustomed to go naked.

It is on this account that we welcome this statue. The Indians of the Northwest hunt, fish, and play ball entirely without clothing. They are accustomed to cold and heat and exposure to all weather, and the undertaking of all sorts of exercise, either almost or quite naked. Here, then, among the Crows, the Sioux, the Chippewas, and the Ojibways, is a chance to study aright the form of man.

It will be urged that this is but a degraded type of mankind, this race of brutal savages, incapable of civilization, incapable of mercy and of truth. But all things must be looked at from a stand-point from which a clear view of them is possible. Your young Sioux may be an unreclaimable savage, belonging to a race from which the world has nothing to expect, but he may still be a brave fellow, capable of wonderful endurance and fortitude, a mighty hunter, cunning, quick, and bold, in splendid physical condition. And for his beauty of form, let us ask the sculptor whose work is before us. Common rumor has it that Mr. Ward has carefully studied the Indians of the plains, and has spent among them one summer at least. And here, before us, is his report. A finely made young man, slender but solid and powerful, not an athlete in the way a prize-fighter is, nor yet with muscles like the Farnese Hercules, rather a gymnast than a boxer. His hands and feet are small, the feet are especially beautiful, delicate as a woman's, well arched up underneath. The limbs are rather slender in proportion to the trunk, but hard and compact; the legs indeed are as well strung and as well adapted to their uses as the tireless hind legs of his dog. Look at the face; if that mask were to be shown you, fished up out of the Nile, you would say it was certainly the mask of an American Indian. There is, indeed, not much intellect in it, nor any high moral qualities, and its "expression" just now is that of strained eyes and subdued eagerness, but it is not brutal, not lower than humanity. We shall not get the highest art from the study of Indians, but we shall get art which will truly represent the form and the action of the human body in natural if not in the highest development. The differences in bodily form between the red race of America and the highest type of Caucasian manhood, are not sufficient to sensibly lower the former from the ideal standard which we base upon the character of the latter. There is a curious analogy between the wild man in relation to the civilized man, and the wild beast in relation to the domestic animal. Every one has noticed in the deer, for instance, the flat muscles, thin and lying close along the bone, tapering rapidly down to long and hard tendons, which play close under the skin, every motion showing the action of the machinery. If we compare this character of the form of the wild creature with the fuller and larger muscles of, for instance, the ox, forming flesh almost to the junction with the bone, the tendon almost disappearing—as in cultivated plants sepals and stamens are forced into petals—we shall find a relation which is repeated in the varieties of mankind. The Indian of the plains does not have large calves and fully developed fore-arm; the habitué of our gymnasiums who so carefully measures the circumference of the arm at the greatest projection of the biceps, would despise an Indian warrior for his slightness of make. The formation of flesh is very slight and slow, the muscles appear to be different in quality from ours of the white race, and act without showing their action through the surface, except by the corded tendons, of which every motion is visible. This, of which a careful examination of the subject will convince an observer, is singularly confirmed by the statue before us. The extremities, of course, show the difference the most forcibly, and the right leg alone will demonstrate the whole matter to one who will take the trouble to compare it with models of established excellence of Greek or other work of pure Caucasian type.

At present, with no chance to study the form of man among the tailor-governed races, we are compelled to go elsewhere for our only procurable models. It might be well to forbid all our sculptors to exhibit any more statues until each had modelled in wax or clay six portrait statuettes, from life, of naked Indian youths, or of Chagres negroes, if they prefer, or of Ceylon divers—at least of men whose daily work is done unclothed.

Feeling as we do about this matter, we should have been glad to have had this statue entirely undraped. We do not believe in that bit of bison-skin; it cannot stay where it is if there is hard running to follow, the thought is unavoidable that the hunter would have thrown it down where his quiver is, for it would be a serious encumbrance. In studying the statue we find this drapery skilfully disposed, and are ready to believe it no serious injury to the group as a work of art, but it seems to detract from the naturalness of conception of the whole work, and to be certainly unnecessary. It is probably a concession to a supposed popular feeling, and may be defended as such.

The light that falls on this statue from the two skylights of the gallery is unfavorable to the front view, and indeed very unsuited for the group. There is one place from which a good view can be had, while the statue stands in the middle of the gallery, and facing toward Broadway; let the spectator go behind and to the right of the statue and about ten feet off. There is beautiful action in the figure as seen from that point.

The modelling of the extended left leg is most admirable. The delicate and minute forms about the knee are surpassingly truthful and beautiful. The right foot, with its clinging toes, holding the ground firmly as the weight of the body is thrown upon this foot, is something worthy of study. The action of the right arm is peculiar in this, that its position does not show at once what it is doing, a hasty glance might leave the impression that the hunter was exciting his dog, but a look at the muscular action of the arm shows its backward pull upon the leash. The modelling of the arm itself is vindicated at the expense of the expressiveness of the whole group. Exhaustive criticism of the group we do not propose to give, but a word must be given to the dog, an admirable study. His feet in their pressure against the ground seem to us as fine as anything in this modern branch of art, the representation of animals. It is a capital dog, altogether; we are only conscious of a thought that his fur might have been carried farther toward completion without disobedience to the law of limitation by material.

MUSIC.

THE OPERA.

OWING to the quarrel between the theatrical managers and the Herald, some new arrangements have been made with regard to the advertising and performances at the various places of amusement. One of these is the appearance of a new programme, in the form of a paper called The Stage. We have had several such papers before: The Entr' Acte, many years ago; The Programme, a wretchedly printed sheet, full of advertisements and puffs; The Playbill, which was well and cleanly printed, and contained some news, musical, artistic, and otherwise; and The Prima Donna, very much like it, which took its place at the Opera for the first two weeks of the season. The Playbill was filled with very impertinent items about social matters, including criticisms and accounts of parties and dinners, and even rumors of engagements and marriages. People in this country have not yet reached the point where they are anxious to have all their private affairs publicly talked of; and the tolerance of this paper by Mr. Maretzek so long, and its admission into the opera-house, was a valid reason why sympathy was withheld from him in his recent tournament with the Herald. The Stage has none of the bad and very few of the good qualities of The Playbill. It is printed badly, with a very ugly, black heading, and contains little except selections from various papers on the war of the managers, and notices of various places of amusement. It is a question whether any such thing is wanted. If it is, it ought to be better made up, and not soil everybody's gloves. It should contain the analysis of the plot of the opera, with an account of the circumstances under which it was written, and some notice of the plan of the music. Then people might enjoy having it, and would not need to be turning over libretto leaves throughout the performance. Indeed, everybody would enjoy the opera far more if they would take pains to study it a little before they came, or leave their books at home.

On Monday of last week Miss de Rossi made her début in "Il Trovatore." She came here from the opera at Lima, for which reason we were quite anxious to hear her, as we remembered being told last winter by a French gentleman of considerable cultivation and experience that he had heard much better operas at Lima than were ever given in New York. We can hardly acquiesce in such an estimate of Miss de Rossi's powers. She is a good singer, and will prove a very useful one. Azucena is a very difficult part, but she filled it well. Her acting was up to the mark, and her singing was almost equal to it. She put much dramatic power in her first scene, and in the last act she felt the whole force of the music and the words, and did much to sustain the piece. In fact, Azucena is the great character of this opera, and demands great power. It is for that reason a good test of merit. Bellini and Mazzoleni were again both unequal to their parts and below their usual standing. Bellini was obliged to shirk a part of "Il balen," and Mazzoleni cut off his sustained notes even shorter than usual. But, indeed, if they have any fine or delicate appreciation of music they are not much to be blamed. How can any one, especially when tired and overworked, sing the music of "Trovatore" with any feeling of pleasure, after it has become familiar to them. Such stuff as this speedily becomes threadbare, and we can imagine no such extinguisher of feeling as being obliged to repeat over and over again such very improbable and forced dramas as this one from the Spanish. It would not be tolerated as an English play. Yet the Academy was crowded almost to overflowing to hear it as an opera, with an audience cultivated in inverse proportion to their numbers. There are several brilliant passages, like the "Il balen" and "Di quella pira," which are simple in themselves and easily understood, and never fail to call out applause, though they merit it as little as the "Anvil Chorus." The final act, including the "Miserere," the tower scene, and the prison scene, outweighs the rest of the opera, and as a work of art surpasses any one act in any of Verdi's operas, unless, indeed, in "La Traviata."

Tuesday brought us "I Puritani," ever welcome and ever beautiful. This is almost the last development of the real opera seria, yet this, like all Bellini's operas, is lyric rather than dramatic. It has little consistency as a whole, but is a beautiful collection of odes and sonnets. "Norma" is considered his master-work, but we always hear "I Puritani" with more pleasure—a sort of sad pleasure, filled even at this time with regrets at the author's early death, when his life was promising so much. Bellini's stay in Paris had greatly improved his style. He felt a reaction from the music of Rossini, which affected all his works. It may be seen in his choruses, which are almost in unison—a style so much abused later by Verdi—while Rossini's are very full, and in the elegiac grace of all his melodies. "I Puritani" was written expressly for Paris, and particular pains were taken to make the style purer and the work more symmetrical and artistic. A great advance was shown in the instrumentation. It was produced in 1834, with a cast long to be remembered—Grisi, Rubini, Tamburini, and Lablache. A year afterward Bellini died. On the evening before his funeral the Théâtre Italien re-opened with "I Puritani," and with the same cast. The singers were greatly affected, and the remembrance of their dead friend so overpowered them that they were scarcely able to sing their parts. The audience was moved almost to tears. The funeral took place the next day in the church of the Invalides, at which a "Lacrymosa" was sung to the tenor melody in the third act, arranged for four voices without accompaniment, by Rubini, Ivanoff, Tamburini, and Lablache.

The rendering of "I Puritani" the other night was, in spite of some drawbacks, the most satisfactory that we have heard since La Grange was here. Miss Kellogg with a little more study might be as admirable an Elvira as she is a Margherita. She needs to throw herself more into the part, and assume a little more fervor and earnestness. In the last act she was simply the distracted Elvira brought to reason by the shock of finding her lover. In the second part she was Miss Kellogg, singing Elvira's music and playing at madness. Her singing is beautiful, but somehow she made us feel her own personality too much. "Son vergin vezzosa" was beautifully given, gracefully and clearly, the music being just adapted to her style, and called down showers of plaudits and an encore. We hope to see Miss Kellogg show, what we are confident she possesses, a rare talent for the tragic as well as the lighter character of passion, but at present it is rather obscured by the latter, and needs careful cultivation. Mr. Irfre was rather disappointing at first. His throat seemed to trouble him, and he could with difficulty raise his voice. He failed in rendering "Ah! se o cara." After the first act he steadily improved, and in "Da quel di" he was frequently interrupted by bravos, and was loudly encored; we were glad that his manifest effort was so well appreciated.

The audience was more than usually cognizant of the fine and delicate points, and displayed its appreciation of them. Yet the dialogue of Bellini and Antonucci, in the second act, which was remarkably well rendered, with almost perfect acting, and a fine appreciation by the singers of every word, seemed hardly noticed, expectation being concentrated on the duet "Suoni la tromba." This, too, was finely done, with energy, yet without the extreme loudness which usually destroys the expression of the song. Antonucci is raising his reputation more and more at every appearance.

"Martha" is not a grand opera, but it is a pleasing one. Written by a German in the French school, it combines the sparkling brilliancy of Auber with a certain homely quietness that renders it very attractive. Our minds cannot always be strained up to the high points of tragedy, and it is very pleasant to refresh ourselves by listening to such light, pretty music as this. The melodies are very simple and sweet, and are remarkably well harmonized. The instrumentation can be fairly judged of from the overture, which is, in this case, a mere résumé of the airs, or table of contents. That does not prevent it from having effective contrasts, all of which were well rendered by the orchestra under Mr. Bergmann, on Friday night. This opera shows a careful finish throughout, and every air and concerted portion is so thoroughly worked up and polished that the piece seems symmetrical, and therefore affects us more agreeably as a whole than many others which have more richness of melody and which contain passages of much greater effect. Miss Kellogg's self-possession and lightness render her very suited to the part of Martha; she sang "The Last Rose of Summer" very charmingly, simply as it was written, without disfiguring it with any cadenzas or flourishes. She was well supported by Miss Phillips as Nancy, who gave her part with equal feeling and truth. Mr. Irfre's voice seems to grow continually weaker. He yet sang "M'appari" with good taste and deserved his encore. The finest scene of the evening was the concluding quintet of the third act. Its simplicity makes it only the more beautiful, enabling the hearer to follow with ease the thread of each voice and keep the various melodies as well as the harmony. The costumes were not all correct. That of Lionel was very bad. The scenery, too, was worse than usual, if worse can be where all is bad. There is no Italian village anywhere in the neighborhood of Richmond Park, if we remember our geography aright. It is rather amusing that, though midnight strikes in two-thirds of the operas that are given, it usually strikes only six, and never more than eight. One can hardly help counting the strokes of a clock, and it is a little annoying to have it always several hours too slow.

We wish the reception accorded to "Martha" might induce Mr. Maretzek to give up the Italian stage for awhile and revive "Fra Diavolo," which pleased so well last winter, and also bring out other French operas, such as "Massaniello," "Stradella," "La Dame Blanche," which has had its thousandth repetition in Paris. Works of this lighter school would do much to purify and refine public taste, and then we might demand "Les Huguenots," "Roland à Roncevaux," "La Reine de Saba," and other grand operas new and old.

"BLIND TOM."

There has been on exhibition at Dodworth's Rooms a musical wonder, a blind negro boy who plays on the piano with some accuracy various complicated pieces. Blind Tom, for so he is called, was a slave on a Georgia plantation and was regarded as almost an idiot. Accidentally his musical faculties were discovered, and he was immediately shown around through various Southern cities. As the war has abolished slavery he can now safely be brought North, and is presented to the public as the greatest prodigy of the age, far surpassing what the boy Mozart once was. Some of our readers may perhaps recollect an article in the "Atlantic Monthly," some two years ago, which contained most extravagant laudations of him, a tithe of which are true. This boy, very dull and unintelligent in every other direction, has evinced a remarkable aptitude for seizing musical ideas and for expressing them in his own way upon the piano. His memory is an uncommon one, and seems the more so from his general stupidity. His blindness is no hindrance, but goes partly to account for his facility of remembrance. The blind nearly always have a strongly developed hearing faculty: in this case it is chiefly concentrated on music. After once hearing a piece, he can give a transcription of it retaining the general idea and flow of the music, but filling up the harmony himself in a clumsy way. We have heard almost as wonderful things done by persons of correct ear, who knew that they had a gift, but were never considered prodigies. He can tell, usually correctly, the names of notes in various chords struck even in rapid succession. His own compositions are destitute of any merit, and seem made up chiefly of reminiscences. He plays with little expression, though he renders some few pieces, such as Gottschalk's "Last Hope," with tolerable correctness.

The exhibition was very distasteful and painful to us. The boy was apparently showing off under compulsion. He appeared on the stage, and, being placed in front of the audience, repeated mechanically some form of words that he had been drilled to: "Gentlemen and ladies, I shall present to you to-night the boy Tom. It is wonderful how this boy, a being so low in the scale of animated nature, so stupid and unintelligent," etc. Speeches such as these he made from time to time, his memory being jogged by the person in attendance, when the idea could be seen to dawn upon him by the lighting up of his face. The poor boy should be given a piano and placed in some asylum, and not be the prey of an avaricious showman.

From the great success of this Company they are enabled to offer superior advantages to policy-holders.

Life policies are issued, payable in annual, or in one, five, or ten annual instalments; also non-forfeiture endowment policies, payable in ten annual payments, which are paid at death, or on arriving at any particular age. Life insurance, as an investment, has no superior, as it has saved millions of dollars to the insured, and thousands of families from ruin. Dividends are paid to policy-holders, thus enabling them to continue their policies, if otherwise unable to do so.

This favorable feature has been the means of saving many policies that would have been forfeited for want of means to continue them, and, in several instances, families once wealthy have thus been saved from utter ruin.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, is pursuing a journey through the South. His letters appear every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

CRUSHERS AND PULVERIZERS,

FOR WET OR DRY WORKING,

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

105 STATE STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

Miners should not purchase machinery before seeing, or sending their friends to examine, the practical working of this series of machinery.

☞ The Whirling Table, or Crusher, weighs less than two tons, and crushes from ten to twelve tons of ore per hour to fine gravel, or two hundred and fifty tons in twenty-four hours.

The Pulverizer weighs two tons, and pulverizes to dust, infinitely finer than stamp work, one ton of ore per hour, or twenty-four tons per diem, equal to the yield of twenty-five or thirty stamps; and the first cost and wear, as compared to this number of stamps, is about one-tenth;—the entire yield being fit for amalgamation without further reduction. The fine dust is not obtained by screening, but by the immediate action of the Pulverizer.

Fifteen horse-power, net, is the maximum power required for one machine.

The cost of the wear, per ton, is less than by any other machine. All wearing parts are now made of Franklinite iron.

Let miners and their friends carefully study the practical working of all other machines and processes offered, and then see ours working in East Boston, Mass. We ask only this.

All of our machines are now made in our own shop. No CONTRACT WORK.

The Week.

THE question of the rights of colored volunteers in the matter of bounties was submitted for decision by the Treasury to the Attorney-General, who has affirmed the absence of all discriminating or prohibitory legislation except during the nineteen days that intervened between the acts of June 15 and July 4, 1864. Consequently directions have been given to pay to colored soldiers "wherever and, except from the 15th of June to the 4th of July, 1864, whenever enlisted during the rebellion, the bounty provided for volunteers by laws existing at the time of such enlistment." The case of those colored soldiers who were not free on the 19th of April, 1861, and yet volunteered between that date and the passage of the act of July 17, 1862, is covered by the opinion of the Attorney-General, that "enlistment in the Union army makes the slave eo instanti a freeman for ever, entitling him to be placed on a footing with white volunteers."

PREACHER and justice were guilty of sharp practice the other day, in Missouri, when the former, in order to brave the constitutional requirement of a loyal oath, omitted the text from his sermon, and was acquitted by the latter of any breach of the law. We shall next be instructed that there can be no invasion of copyright where the book is republished without a title, or even—who knows?—without a table of contents. Not having the judge's decision before us, we cannot vouch for his distinguishing between a nominal and a genuine text. But if the real article is demanded, how many clergymen last Sunday thought they were preaching sermons when they were doing no such thing! Neither they nor their hearers could trace the connection between the passage from Scripture and the teaching that followed, and yet unquestionably they believed themselves respectively delivering or listening to sermons. Or, if appearance is alone consulted, and the text determines the character of the discourse, as the flag the character of the cargo which it covers, how much political preaching may and will arrogate the respectable title of sermonizing, to the infinite scandal, we doubt not, of the Missouri judge himself, who has opened the door for it! Henceforth the simple announcement of a sacred text—and for what subject, even if relevancy were insisted on, would one be wanting?—will shield the pulpit orator from every reproach, and silence for ever the outcry which once was so familiar and efficacious.

MR. J. H. REAGAN, ex-Postmaster-General of the Confederacy, recently liberated with Mr. Stephens from Fort Warren, has written a letter to his fellow-citizens in Texas, which ought to go post-free and be circulated at Government expense in that distant territory. Though composed while its author was still in confinement, it cannot be said to be the product of duress, but bears every internal mark of spontaneity and sincerity. Mr. Reagan premises that the advice he offers, like the offering of it, is bitterly humiliating to Southern pride and prejudices, yet he conceives that any other would be cruel to his late associates in rebellion. He tells them frankly that their status is that of a conquered people, whose every right of self-government is in abeyance and dependent on the will of the power which has subdued them. The terms, therefore, which are extended to them must be accepted, with gratitude because they are no harsher than these: 1st, recognition of the supreme authority of the Government of the United States within its proper sphere, and its right to protect itself against disintegration by secession; 2d, recognition of the abolition of slavery, and the right of the freedmen to the privileges and protection of the law of the land. But he perceives that even these concessions will not be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the North. Provision must be made for conferring the elective franchise upon the former slaves. To this step he anticipates the most stubborn resistance. Nevertheless he lays down the approaches to it. First is the removal of all distinctions of color from the courts and the statutes under which they administer justice. Next is the establishment of an intellectual and moral, and, if thought necessary, a property test for the admission of all persons to the elective franchise, in order to secure its intelligent exercise. The sum of the second proposition is better than Mr. Reagan's exegesis, which, to be sure, he makes upon his own responsibility, without being strenuous about its adoption. For he would not disfranchise any person now qualified to vote, but would require of all subsequent electors that they should be males, twenty-one years of age, United States citizens, residents of the State for twelve months, and of the district, county, or precinct for six, able to read the English language understandingly, and who should have paid the taxes of the preceding year, and not be disqualified by crime. It is evident that while the colored population are satisfying these conditions, they must submit to be ruled by their former oppressors—a prospect which will be more pleasing to Mr. Reagan's white readers than any that he unveils to them. If we cannot share in this satisfaction, let us at least acknowledge the soundness of the reasons with which the repentant Texan bolsters up his measures. He shows that they alone are competent to remove the antagonism between the white race and the black, and alone—a point which is too little dwelt on in our present discussions—can "disarm and put an end to inter-State, sectional, political agitation." Mr. Reagan betrays no prejudices against the negro, accepts him implicitly as a part of the American people, and expects, from the general docility of his disposition, that he will be in the main an industrious and useful citizen. The holding of these views is not perhaps an offset for participation in treason and revolt, but is a better excuse for open prison-doors than any oath yet taken by Southern lips.

THE Fenian "Congress" has been in session during the past week in Philadelphia. We could wish for the credit of the Irish character, and altogether without reference to its political aims, that it had a more practical air. A large committee of private persons, most of them poor and obscure, is positively undertaking to conquer England, destroy her army and navy, and ruin her credit; for that is what the deliverance of Ireland by the Fenians means. The financial world will hear with some impatience that there has been some delay in the issue of "the bonds of the Irish Republic," owing to "circumstances over which nobody has any control." One step towards Irish independence has, however, been made. A deputation of the congress is said to have secured the unconditional release of John Mitchell. A few editorial articles from this gentleman will doubtless give the British constitution and the framework of British society a preliminary shaking that will make the final smash easy work. The way he "chawed up" the Yankees in the Richmond Examiner will, we hope, be a warning to the European powers.

It is possible that among the blessings which the Emperor Napoleon's intervention in Mexican affairs will have brought on America will be the cholera. The steam frigate Amazone sailed from Toulon on the 22d of September, having on board General Osmont, his family and staff. There had been two cases of cholera on board the frigate previous to the 22d, and on that day, and at the very moment of her departure, a third case occurred, the sufferer being a civilian, who was dining at the officers' table. He was landed; but when we consider how rife the disease was at Toulon in the last days of September—there were 61 deaths by cholera at that place on the day that the Amazone sailed—it would not be surprising if the frigate were to take the Eastern plague to the West. She is bound for Vera Cruz, one of yellow fever's strongholds, and may take out what may be considered something very proper to exchange against that prompt agent of death. That three persons should have been stricken down by the pestilence on board the Amazone, and yet that craft allowed to sail, is not very creditable to the French authorities. Nor is their conduct to be praised in despatching ships from Toulon, where cholera has raged with severity; and yet not only was the Amazone sent off, but the transport Jura also, with five hundred soldiers of the Foreign Legion, the worst kind of desperate characters, and just the sort of human material that this form of the plague is most apt to fasten upon as its properest food. They may be half dead before the Jura shall have reached Vera Cruz, and so feed the fishes of the Atlantic instead of the vultures and buzzards of Mexico. The condition of Mexico is such that the coming in of the cholera there would ensure its rapid spread over the country; and thence it might "progress" into our Southwestern States, where it would find a people predisposed to its attacks, the Southrons being in that irritable frame of mind which follows from unsuccessful warfare—and their failure is of a peculiarly mortifying character. Then there is much physical suffering in the South, and that is a great ally of cholera. Pestilence often follows war; and it is often carried over the world by soldiers, as it may be in this instance by Napoleon's legionaries, whom he employs to keep "the elect of the Mexicans" on his occidental throne against the wishes of his subjects.

German free labor in Texas has again, the South being witness, raised a cotton crop superior to any grown by slaves. The farmers who have achieved this success were in constant jeopardy under the old régime, for the very reason that they furnished an irrefragable argument against the system by which they were surrounded, one of whose fundamental falsehoods was that the climate was fatal to white labor in the fields. The undeniable aversion of the freedmen, now that compulsion is removed, to the cultivation of cotton, renders it probable that we shall eventually see the production of this staple almost exclusively in the hands of the whites.

Mr. Townsend Harris, of this city, corrects the statement which we made in our last issue, that "while there have been several translations of the writings of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius into the English language, there has been but one of the writings of Epictetus." Mr. Harris writes:

"The following is a copy of the title-page of a translation of Epictetus, now in my possession:

"'Epictetus His Morals with Simplicitus His Comment. Made English from the Greek, By George Stanhope, D.D. The second edition corrected, with the addition of the life of Epictetus from the French of Monsieur Boileau. London: Printed for Richard Sare, at Gray's-Inn-Gate, Holborn, MDCC.'"

The Kentucky muddle will bear more light than is shed upon it by the Smith-Palmer correspondence which was submitted to Secretary Stanton, and which preceded the termination of martial law in that most troublesome of States. Gen. Smith charged Gen. Palmer with disregarding the slave laws of Kentucky by his system of passes, which had filled the towns, cities, and camps with idle and vagrant negroes; and also with indifference to the fate of the Union officials whom, in co-operation with Gov. Bramlette, he had ordered to observe certain precautions against disloyal voters at the last election, and who had since been indicted by disloyal judges. Gen. Palmer rests his defence upon the first issue rather than upon the second, and his argument is powerful and ingenious. The truth is, that the present anarchic condition of society in Kentucky is due to the fanaticism of the slaveholders themselves before the general was called in to shield them from the consequences of their own criminal folly. When they had alarmed and confused the minds of the slaves by misrepresenting the intentions of Government towards them, and had turned away from their employment and support the families of colored soldiers, there could be no other result than a general desertion of the plantations, and a flocking of the blacks to the towns and cities. The authorities, justly apprehensive of the consequences, appealed to Gen. Palmer, who then devised the much-assailed pass-system, which, overruling the State laws forbidding the carriage of colored persons in public conveyances, permitted the bearer to go at pleasure in search of employment. Ten thousand crossed the Ohio alone. The general admits that many of these may have been slaves by Kentucky law, and many more by the pretensions of those who denied the validity of the laws of Congress. For himself, he was not concerned to separate bond from free: he always presumed that the applicant for a pass was free. Moreover, there was no slavery in Kentucky. The laws which regulate it there did not create it, nor could they maintain it in the absence of that force in which the system originated. The mere existence of a slave code does not prove the existence of slavery—unless it also does in Virginia and the other subjugated States. The general's hatred of slavery finds a hearty and unreserved expression. "It drove me from the State in my boyhood," he exclaims. "It may do it again; but it will receive no protection, acknowledgment, support, or countenance from me."

The North Carolina Convention adjourned on Thursday last, to reassemble on the fourth Monday in May. On the 14th, it unanimously resolved to request of the President the removal of the colored troops from the State, as their presence is "very injurious to the colored people, and excessively annoying to the white." On the 16th, it voted to submit to the people the anti-secession and anti-slavery ordinances. On the 19th, it passed an ordinance preventing any future legislature assuming or paying any debt created directly or indirectly for the prosecution of the rebellion. This action was in reluctant compliance with a previous telegram from the President, which urged it strongly. For a more extended view of the character and proceedings of this convention, we refer to the letter of our correspondent at the South on another page. The Mississippi Legislature met on the 15th at Jackson. Gov. Humphreys, in his inaugural, avowed his original disbelief in the doctrine of secession, pointed to the definitive arbitrament of arms, and augured "reliable fidelity in peace" on the part of the people of the State from their "unflinching fidelity in war"—which many simple minds may regard as a non-sequitur. It was due, he continued, to the honor of a State which, by her own solemn act, had abolished slavery, to show by her future that she has done so in good faith, "and that slavery shall never again flourish in her border, in whatsoever name or guise it is brought forward." The Hon. Wm. L. Sharkey was chosen almost unanimously by the Senate last Thursday to fill the unexpired term of Jefferson Davis. The Tennessee Senate on the same day passed a bill admitting negro testimony to the courts by the very close vote of 10 to 9.

Gen. Howard, on his way to Charleston, passed through Wilmington, N. C., where he addressed the citizens and freed people. From Charleston, where he was at last accounts, he will proceed to Columbia.

Lieut. Eldridge, one of Col. Thomas's officers, informs the Bureau that one of the strongest opponents it has in Mississippi is Joe Davis, brother of Jeff., who is loud in denouncing it and the Government together. He boasts that he has not only not taken the amnesty oath, but has no intention of doing so; that he will keep his own property in spite of the Government, and will lay claim also to his brother's.

Gen. Swayne writes that he will be obliged to discharge all his contract surgeons for want of funds. The rumor which was current with the freed people that the lands will be divided amongst them at Christmas still prevails, and interferes to some extent with their making contracts at present. The general has sent Maj. Miller to Selma and Demopolis for the purpose of extending agencies along the line of the railroad on which they are situated. Chaplain Buckley, assistant superintendent, has been ordered to Montevallo, Talladega, and Jacksonville on the same errand. One of the ordinances of the late Alabama Convention was to the effect that all marriages heretofore solemnized, whether "in slavery or since emancipation, by any one officiating as a minister, or any one claiming to exercise the right to solemnize matrimony, whether bond or free, are hereby ratified and made valid, provided the parties are now living together as man and wife;" that freed people now living together as man and wife "are hereby declared to be man and wife;" that the issues of such marriages or cohabitations are hereby legitimatized; and that hereafter all freed people "shall be bound by the same laws of intermarriage and be required to conform to similar ceremonies, with the exception that they shall not be required to give bonds in marrying, as in the case of whites." But it was also made the duty of the General Assembly to prohibit the intermarriage of whites with negroes or persons of mixed blood. The northern part of Alabama has been transferred from Gen. Fisk to Gen. Swayne.

Gen. Dudley has been appointed superintendent of freedmen's affairs for West Tennessee, in place of Gen. Tillson, transferred to Georgia. His headquarters are at Memphis.

Col. Osborne, assistant commissioner for Florida, is engaged in spreading his agencies over the State. The freedmen there are doing comparatively well, but few being dependent.

Gen. A. Baird will relieve Assistant Commissioner Conway in Louisiana.

—Gen. Saxton writes to Mr. Francis G. Shaw, president of the National Freedmen's Relief Association of this city, that the resources of the Bureau are quite inadequate to relieve the destitution which exists among the colored people in his department, and which will certainly be productive of the greatest suffering this winter unless supplies are contributed from the North. The unsettling and paralysis of industry and the waste of war have brought about this result in large measure. "Thirty-five thousand blankets," says the general, "are needed in South Carolina and the Sea Islands alone." Woollen shirts, pantaloons, women's and children's under-clothing and dresses, and shoes and stockings, are also particularized. Great care will be observed in the distribution, and no article of clothing will be superfluous or amiss. Donations may be sent to the rooms of the association, 76 John Street. Gen. Saxton is constantly applied to by the old proprietors of the lands set apart by Gen. Sherman, on the Sea Islands and on the main, for a restoration of their former estates. Each application is forwarded to Gen. Howard with this endorsement by Gen. Saxton:

"The freedmen were promised the protection of the Government in their possession. This order was issued under a great military necessity with the approval of the War Department. More than forty thousand destitute freedmen have been provided with homes under its promises. Appointed executive officer to carry it out, I should break faith with the freedmen now by recommending the restoration of any of these lands. In my view, this order of General Sherman is as binding as a statute."

There can be no doubt that the late war has ensured this country hereafter a permanent and a prominent place in European discussions. England, especially at this juncture, is watching us intently; France scarcely less so. The latter is concerned for Mexico, the former anticipates perhaps from us a new way of paying off old-debts. So, while arrests are brisk in Ireland—while five of the Fenian prisoners who were examined in Dublin have been committed for trial for high treason, and Mr. O'Brennan, proprietor of the Connaught Patriot, for treason and felony combined—the ports and coasts are scrupulously guarded against the admission of unlawful freight from America; not unreasonably while the brotherhood on this side of the ocean are making such numerically imposing demonstrations as, for want of something better, our papers daily crowd their columns in reporting. The list of British holders of the Confederate loan, made public here a few weeks ago, produced a pretty fluttering among the distinguished parties implicated. Their denials, however, have been so general and so explicit, that the list must be abandoned as authentic, spite of an assertion from Washington that the original document is in possession of the Government. What is the character of that document? will still be a question, until it shall have been exactly reproduced with all the evidence in its favor. Meanwhile, it will be safest to doubt the nobility, politicians, and editors who were mixed up in the charge of speculating in our national misfortune, being so little shrewd as not to cover their tracks if they invested at all, or so confident at any time of the success of the cause which they unblushingly espoused as to risk even as many farthings as there were pounds written against their names. Lord Brougham opened the Social Science Congress at Sheffield on the 4th, to quote the language of the Spectator, "with one of those dreary addresses which travel far and say nothing." Count Bismark visited the Emperor Napoleon at Biarritz during the first week of the month. French papers attempt to disparage the significance of the interview, but Bismark's own organ at home insists upon its importance in maintaining the friendly relations between France and Prussia. It certainly follows hard upon the unexceptional denunciation of the latter country by the Paris press. The accounts of the cholera in France appear to be less threatening than hitherto. Yet it is said that the pestilence has struck inward, as in Spain, and that cases have occurred even in England. The Balearic Isles are still scourged. An Italo-American Steam Navigation Company has just been formed, with a capital of about $4,000,000, to establish lines between Italy and North and South America. At the start, a fortnightly trip will be made between Genoa or Leghorn and New York, and a monthly trip between the same Italian ports and Rio Janeiro, Montevideo, and Buenos Ayres, with authority to extend these lines to Naples, Messina, and Palermo. The vessels will carry the Italian flag, and an annual subsidy of $150,000 is asked of the Government. The official recommendation to the Austrian censor of the press to be moderate in discovering and punishing offences, seems to have been heeded in the case of the editor of a Vienna paper, The New Free Press, who was sentenced, under extenuating circumstances, to a week's confinement in his own apartment! The territorial assembly of St. Petersburg held recently a brief session in that city, which is remarkable as the first meeting on equal terms of the late serfs, proprietors, and peasants, who deliberated together as delegates, not without constraint, but with encouraging harmony. Without official statistics, the assembly could do little else than formulize the subjects of reform. These were, among others, a more equitable distribution of the land-tax, and of the obligations resting upon the peasantry, such as the quartering of troops and furnishing horses to military trains; an enquiry into the means of diminishing drunkenness, which has assumed alarming proportions in consequence of the reduced price of brandy; and a similar enquiry as to the best mode of preventing destructive conflagrations in the country, for which there are no adequate safeguards. The assembly eagerly availed itself of the privilege of publishing its debates, and a reporter from the leading city paper was present at all the sessions.

There was an eclipse of the sun on Thursday last, which was visible in its various aspects over nearly the whole of North America and the northern half of South America, as well as in parts of the eastern hemisphere. It was annular to the dwellers on a narrow belt, of which the central line, beginning at the mouth of the Columbia River, passed nearly through St. Joseph, Mo., Paducah, Ky., Nashville, Tenn., and Charleston, S. C. Various scientific bodies improved so favorable an opportunity for observation. In this city the appearance of the sun at the height of its obscuration was that of an inverted crescent, whose greatest thickness was about equal to a semi-diameter. Spite of transient clouds the phenomenon was easily witnessed, though in other cities the rain prevented. A fortnight previous there was a lunar eclipse in the clearest of nights, which was visible in England and on the Continent. It lasted two hours and two minutes. The duration of the solar eclipse on Thursday was three hours and seventeen minutes.

SOUTHERN POLICY.

WE publish in another column some very striking and suggestive letters from the commercial correspondent sent down to the South by some Massachusetts manufacturers. His opinions, as we have remarked before, are entitled to all the greater weight from the fact that he is looking at things from a purely business point of view, and his conclusions, we may add, are those which any intelligent person might fairly draw from the interesting mass of observations forwarded to us every week by our special correspondent. They are, moreover, conclusions at which any intelligent reader of the history of the last twenty years might have arrived à priori, without ever seeing a Southern newspaper or hearing a word of news from the rebellious States. The stories which the "Conservative" press tell us of the hearty acquiescence of the Southern people in the new order of things, and of their sudden determination to forget the past and become in feeling as in fact citizens of the United States, would, if true, contradict all the teachings of history and all our experience of human nature. So many wonderful things have lately happened, however, that many people doubtless consider knowledge of history and of human nature of very little value; we are, therefore, glad to have these reasons confirmed by deductions from actual observations of the facts.

In commenting a few weeks ago upon the course which the South is pursuing, we spoke of it as "a display of consummate political ability," and so we still consider it. At no time in its history have its leading men given stronger proofs of proficiency in the political art than during the last six months. A stupid, inexperienced, or clumsy-minded people would, after such a conflict as they have just gone through, have done what their admirers in England expected them to do—kept up an irregular warfare, or displayed their passion and mortification in sullen, passive resistance to Federal authority. But Lee had hardly laid down his arms when their leaders seemed to take the whole situation in at a glance, and decide upon their course with that swiftness, precision, and unanimity which won them so many Congressional victories in by-gone days, and are, in our opinion, destined to win them many more. Northern fury was at once disarmed by loud protestations of submission and resignation. No pride, or sentiment, was allowed for one moment to stand in the way of any declarations which appeared to be necessary to appease the conqueror. And what has been more remarkable—and it furnishes a striking illustration of the extraordinary political discipline which is still maintained amongst the Southern population—whatever the leading men of each State decided upon was unhesitatingly supported by the whole people, without any preliminary agitation or discussion, without even meetings or newspapers. Every sacrifice which the fortune of war made necessary—such as the abolition of slavery, the repudiation of the rebel debt—or which would facilitate reconstruction, has been made with a cheerfulness which took from it all appearance of sacrifice, and has actually cheated half the North into the belief that it was no sacrifice at all, but a free-will offering. We venture to say that there is not in history a more brilliant example of power of adaptation to circumstances.

And no piece of policy, hopeless as it must have seemed at the outset to many of the Southerners themselves, hopeless as it did seem last June to all the world beside, was ever more successful. It completely disarmed Mr. Johnson in a few weeks. When he took office he was breathing nothing but threatening and slaughter against traitors—and the whole South was traitorous. He incorporated, while in his first state of mind, a clause in his amnesty proclamation intended to strike down what was left of the aristocracy at a blow, a regular declaration of "war to the châteaux." But he had hardly been two months in power, and had had a few interviews with prominent "pardon-seekers," when he roared as gently as any sucking dove. Rarey never performed more tricks with "Cruiser" than the Southern president-tamers now perform on the terrible Tennesseean Democrat. They sit on him, turn him over, tie up his hands, put their heads in his mouth, make him shed as many tears and make as many "conciliatory speeches" as they please. And they took all the sting out of the "$20,000 clause" by getting him to establish a pardoning machine, which works day and night, and into which the vilest traitor may step at any moment in the full assurance that, after a little formal tossing about inside, he will be turned out in a week or two a clean, white-robed "citizen," without a speck or stain of guilt upon him.

The effect on the country has been not less remarkable. The wrath of the North appears to have almost entirely evaporated. There seems little doubt that by New Year's Day even Jefferson Davis himself might be dismissed to his home, with the acquiescence or approval of the great majority of the community. The indignation excited by the horrors of the rebel prison-pens has apparently concentrated itself upon one wretched underling, whose brutality, be it ever so great, is after all a more "damned spot" on the hands of those who appointed and kept him in office than on his. The real chiefs of the rebellion, the real authors of all its woes and horrors, are one by one dropping off to their homes, amidst much hand-shaking, dining, and "paying of respects." The newspapers are filled with eulogies on the Southern temper, and glowing pictures of the peace, prosperity, and, above all, of the harmony in store for us in the future. The country is tired of agitation and of strife, and is not disposed to look too narrowly into the proofs the South offers of its sincerity. Trade, too, is reviving, and Southern trade, as we all know, has always been the great anodyne of Northern politicians. In neither the Republican nor Democratic platform is there a single proposition or proviso to which the assent of the South is not already secured; so that we do not, for our parts, anticipate the exaction, next December, from the States lately in revolt of a single condition of their formal reinstalment in the Union to which they are not already fully reconciled. Their concessions to what they consider the negro-mania of the North are great. It is sheer absurdity to tell us that the abolition of slavery is nothing, the legalization of marriage and of education is nothing. They are the very foundations of civil society; but though much, they are still little. As long as the whites retain the exclusive power of legislation, the spirit of caste and the political power of the South remain unbroken, and "that unconquerable hate and study of revenge" which the correspondent whose letters we quote describes as still existing, will find a thousand means of display and gratification.

What, then, are we to look for as the result of the hasty and premature settlement which we now fear? Not, certainly, the triumph of Southern ideas, or the utter and final defeat of Northern policy; but, as we believe, a prolongation of the agitation which has torn the country for the last forty years; a renewal in the press and in Congress of the old conflict, in which the North, rich, prosperous, unwieldy, and divided, will labor under the old disadvantages in watching and foiling its adroit, astute, and compact adversary. That the South will ever be allowed to retain the negroes in its hands as political outcasts, and embody its prejudices about them in legislation, without vigorous resistance and final defeat, scarcely anybody can believe. The North is burdened with a conscience of which Southern dexterity has never been able to rob it, and the existence of a body of freemen deprived of civil rights in the midst of a democratic republic, is so great a scandal, and so revolting to the democratic feeling, that there is no chance of the country ever finally submitting to it or forgetting it. Negro disabilities will have eventually to disappear; though at what cost, or by what process, the political emancipation of the race will have to be secured, if it be not secured or provided for now, he would be a shrewd man who could conjecture.

If our fears should be realized, of course a greater portion than ever of the burden of their own deliverance will fall upon the blacks. They will have to support the exertions of their allies at the North by a constantly increasing display of energy, industry, and moral worth, for the great argument for their confirmed degradation will unquestionably be always drawn, as it is now drawn, from their ignorance or idleness. And if this view of the case be correct, the responsibility resting on all charitable persons at the North becomes greatly increased.

The political importance of the work of negro education, during the next few years, becomes immense, greater far than could be ever claimed before for any similar undertaking.

THE EIGHT-HOUR MOVEMENT.

WEALTH is the result of the combined operation of labor and capital. Two consequences would seem to follow from this truth. One is, that their combined action, to produce the best effects, must be harmonious; and the other is, that the product of their joint action must be divided between them according to the natural laws by which each is respectively governed. These laws cannot be resisted without punishment. Only by obeying them is success possible. Success means the largest attainable production of wealth and its just distribution between capital and labor. If this be so, then "the eight-hour labor movement," as it is called, which is now causing some excitement and alarm in the public mind, is unwise and injurious; for its effect, if successful, would be to diminish production and give to labor a part or the whole of the profits which, by natural law, would belong to capital, which, therefore, ought to belong to it, and cannot be refused without ill consequences to both labor and capital.

To prove this, it is only necessary to state one or two plain and simple principles that relate to wages and profits and their relations to each other. These principles show that the interests of labor and capital are not opposed but identical, that they are promoted by harmonious action and injured by discord, and that the share of each in the gains of both is allotted by natural and necessary laws which cannot be resisted by any human contrivance.

The rate of wages is determined by competition among capitalists to obtain labor, and among laborers to obtain employment. Labor may be regarded as a commodity which one class has to sell and the other wishes to buy. Like all other commodities, it is governed by the natural law of supply and demand. When laborers are numerous in proportion to the demand for them, wages are low; that is to say, when labor is plenty it is cheap, just as wheat is cheap when it is plenty. When laborers are few and the demand great, wages are high, just as a failure of the wheat crop increases its price. The capitalist who buys labor tries, like all buyers, to get it as cheap as he can. The workingman who sells labor tries, like all sellers, to get as much for it as he can. The bargaining between the two is the process by which the rate of wages is ascertained, just as the market price of everything else is ascertained. It can be fixed by no other means, for there is no tribunal possible with power to determine it from day to day, or with knowledge equal to that of the parties. Evidently one of the parties is not such a tribunal. The market price, then, thus established by free bargaining, is the necessary price. That it is the just one, also, is to be inferred from another principle.

The market price, which is finally settled by competition or by the natural operation of the law of supply and demand, is that at which the whole of the commodity offered for sale will absorb the whole of the fund applicable to its purchase. Increase the commodity, the fund remaining the same, the price will fall. Increase the fund, the commodity remaining the same, the price will rise. This is a universal law, and rules alike the market for labor and for coal, or corn, or gold. The rate of wages will be that at which the whole of the funds applicable to the purpose will be absorbed in paying for the whole of the labor. If by low wages a part only of this fund be used, the remainder seeking similar employment will cause competition among capitalists and raise the rate. If wages are too high, the fund would be exhausted before the amount of labor is, and some of the laborers would either remain unemployed or soon reduce the rate by competition among themselves.

The proportion, therefore, between the number of laborers and the fund for their employment determines the rate of wages. This fund is the active capital of the country not required for other means of production, as, for example, machinery. Therefore the rate of wages can be raised in two ways only: by the increase of this fund or by the decrease of the number of laborers. It thus appears that by the normal, unfettered action of the natural laws of industry, the capitalist and the laborer are alike benefited. Should the capitalist be able to reduce wages below the natural standard, a portion of his capital would remain unemployed to his loss. Should the laborer succeed in raising wages above the rate at which the law of supply and demand would fix them, he would encroach upon funds appropriated to means of production other than labor, to the loss of the capitalist, indeed, but to his own ultimate injury also. When capital ceases to be profitable in one branch of business it seeks another, and, if there be no other at home, it goes elsewhere. If threatened with unjust legal coercion or popular violence, and both these are implied or expressed in this eight-hour labor movement, it disappears. It is very timid and far-sighted, and runs away or hides itself at the approach of danger. Its withdrawal is proof that the body politic is sick, for it is the life-blood of business, and when it goes, enterprise languishes, trade becomes inactive, production is diminished, wealth ceases to accumulate, poverty overtakes all classes, wages fall, labor becomes degraded and slavish, and civilization decays. These, as many examples in history prove, are the fatal effects of unwise and oppressive laws on the part of government, or of unjust attempts on the part of individuals to violate the security of property and the freedom of industry.

Such is the character of the eight-hour labor movement. It is a gigantic strike, the object of which is to force capitalists to pay a rate of wages to be fixed, not by contract between the parties, but by the laborers only. Eight hours is to be henceforth a legal day's work, instead of ten hours, as at present, and the capitalist is to pay for eight hours as much as he does now for ten. He is to be compelled to do so by law, such a law as cannot "be evaded by any artifice its opponents may invent," and the members of the league pledge themselves to "visit with just and exemplary action every man and every combination that, by opposing us, shows unmistakable hostility not only to the movement we are engaged in, but to the very spirit of republican institutions." Such opponents are also stigmatized as "monarchists"—"unworthy the confidence of the people." The meaning of all this is plain enough. By political agitation, and the offer of the working-men's vote (it has been accepted by the Democratic party), legislation is to be obtained to regulate the rate of wages according to the pleasure of the laborer, which happens now to be that eight hours of work per day shall sell for as much as ten hours, and all who oppose the plan are pointed out as objects and victims of popular indignation. Jack Cade went no further than this when he declared, "There shall be in England seven half-penny loaves sold for a penny, and the three-hooped pot shall have ten hoops." He added, also, what was a very natural consequence of the execution of such a promise: "All the realm shall be in common, and in Cheapside shall my palfry go to grass." Legislatures can and often have played the part of Jack Cade, and when either they or mobs shall, in this country, dictate the price at which commodities shall be sold, the time is not far distant when all things will be in common and grass grow in Broadway.

If the principles above stated be correct, it is enough to condemn the scheme of this eight-hour labor league to say that, if executed, it would diminish production, for eight hours of work cannot produce as much as ten hours, which is now called a day's work. To diminish production would be to diminish capital, the fund out of which labor is paid. It would diminish capital, also, by taking, for the laborer, a portion of it that belongs by natural law, and therefore justly, to the capitalist; and still more by the loss of confidence in the security of property and the stability of business that would be caused by the tyrannical interference of the Government with the freedom of industry and the sanctity of contracts, and by threats of popular violence.

There never was a time when the plans of this labor league could have been more injurious to the working-men than at present. We have shown that the rate of wages could be increased only by increasing capital or by diminishing the number of laborers. The plan in question proposes to prevent the growth of capital at the very moment when emigration is adding more rapidly than ever before to the working classes. Moreover, there never was so little excuse for such a movement as now, for never before were the laboring classes so prosperous. The destruction of war has caused an enormous demand for every commodity produced by skill and toil, vast fields of enterprise and boundless sources of wealth stimulate adventure to unwonted boldness, business thrives, prices are high, wages are high, all pursuits are calling more loudly than ever for work—free work, energetic work, well rewarded work. The nation calls for it, too, in order that she may bear the heavy load of debt and taxation imposed by the war. More than ever before is work needed and demanded, better than ever before is it paid. What is the answer of the working-men if they are represented by this labor league? "We will work less than ever, and must be paid as much for the small as for the large quantity. We control political power, and by its hand will add to our wages the profits of the capitalist. All who oppose us are monarchists, aristocrats, enemies to free institutions, and shall feel our vengeance."

This movement comes certainly at a most unpropitious moment for us all. The labor of two hours a day for the whole country would pay the interest of the national debt twice over. The loss of capital which the violent measures of the labor league, if carried out, would cause, would amount to a much larger sum. Only by the united efforts of labor and capital can we expect to pay the debt. Can we do it with diminished resources? To stop work is to impoverish the country and repudiate the debt.

THE CRISIS IN PRUSSIA.

Prior to the outbreak of 1848, William, Prince of Prussia, the childless King's oldest brother, was the most unpopular man in the country, being regarded as the representative man of the feudal and military reaction. During the Berlin street-fights he absconded to England, for the purpose, as his friends asserted, of studying democracy and constitutional liberty. On the credit of these researches he was elected to the Assembly after his return, occupied a seat there for one day, and then turned his enquiring mind exclusively to the art of war. In 1849 he was at the head of the troops sent into Baden and the Palatinate to subdue the republicans. Outnumbering their opponents ten to one, his soldiers won easy victories, which he has since vaunted as the most heroic exploits of the age. He caused about forty captured republicans to be shot down in cold blood, and distinguished himself by other useless cruelties. During the reactionary period of 1850 to 1857, excluded even from the confidence of the camarilla, he lived in a sort of exile at Coblenz, on the Rhine. It is inherent in the system that the reigning monarch should suspect the heir presumptive, and the heir apparent grumble at the living ruler.

William I., who has worn the crown since 1860, now sixty-eight years of age, is of an order of talent decidedly inferior to the ordinary standard of mediocrity. Narrow-minded and stubborn, his education was more than defective, his tastes are the reverse of intellectual, and his passion is the army. For the soldiers he provides with paternal care, understanding the minutest details of the service, and scrupulously attending to them. The very ideal of a drill-sergeant, he is more interested in the number of buttons on a coat than in the gravest question of public law. The highest reach of his intellect travels over the same range of subjects as did his brother's disordered fancy; an observation to which the populace of Berlin have given expression by dubbing him "Lehman II." At a grand review of the victorious Schleswig-Holstein army, in 1864, the King, observing a stalwart sergeant decorated with more than one badge of extraordinary merit, called him out of the ranks and enquired his name. The favored one turned very red, and answered, "John." "John what?" asked his majesty. "It is n't my fault, sire," the hero blurted out, "but my name is Lehman too, and it is the only surname I have got."

Nothing could indicate more unmistakably the unpopularity of the last years of Frederic William IV. than the fact that, on assuming the duties of the regency, his brother was for a time the most popular man in Prussia. These two years were the honeymoon of his reign. The abolition of some of the most obnoxious abuses, such as the Manteuffel ministry, and the suspension of the chicanery of gens-d'armes and police commissioners, so perfectly sated the moderate political cravings of the people that they talked of nothing but the "new era," and acted as though they had reached the political millennium. They were soon to learn that liberties are not the gifts of princes, but the laborious achievements of the people.

The first apple of discord sprang out of the Italian war of 1859. In placing his army on a war footing—for what ally or against what enemy no one could tell—he discovered that the "Landwehr," his main reliance, was ill-prepared for offensive operations, and still less for mere demonstrations. The standing army, in which every man of the proper age was required to serve for two years, between the ages of seventeen and twenty-three years, numbered, in times of peace, no more than 120,000 men. The soldiers discharged from serving with the flag were attached for three years to the reserve. To increase the defensive power of the country a further body, consisting of those discharged from the reserve, constituted the "Landwehr," who were regimented and officered, but called to arms for about a month in the year, or every two years, only. There was a "Landwehr" of the first ban and a "Landwehr" of the second ban, the latter comprising men between the ages of thirty-one and forty years, to be summoned to the field on great emergencies only. The standing army and the Landwehr of the first call together constituted a body of 600,000, while the addition of the Landwehr of the second call would swell the grand total to about 800,000 men, equal to about four per cent. of the whole population. Of course the "mobilization" of such a force involved the derangement of the entire business and industry of the country, an inconvenience which would have been little regarded in times of foreign invasion or great public danger, but which, when the necessity of the step was by no means apparent to the common understanding, became exceedingly irksome to the people, and operated as a hindrance to the Government. Besides, the institution had been suffered to fall into neglect; the officers were inexperienced, unfit for the field, and strangers to their men. The whole was too much like a militia to be pitted against well-drilled troops.

To remedy these defects, the thirty-six infantry regiments of the Landwehr, instead of being drilled for only a month in the year, were kept permanently under arms, and practically converted into regiments of the line, and the number of the cavalry and artillery of the standing army were gradually enhanced to correspond with the increased force of infantry. The requisite number of recruits was to be obtained by increasing the number of years' service required in the standing army from five to seven years, three of which were to be passed (by the infantry) under the flag, and four with the reserve, while the years of service in the second ban of the Landwehr were to be reduced four years. The number of recruits annually raised for the army, hitherto amounting to 40,000, was to be enhanced to 63,000, and the first ban of the Landwehr, or Landwehr Proper, was to go out of existence.

But the Landwehr, in the eyes of every Prussian, was the most hallowed of institutions, the last relic of the democratic enactments of the Stein and Hardenberg period. It realized the cherished idea, embodied in a law of 1814, that every able-bodied Prussian, without distinction of wealth or rank, is bound to defend his country so long as his years permit. It was the exponent of the equality of the citizens before the law, and the bulwark of the nation's liberties against foreign and domestic foes, which had compassed the downfall of Napoleon in 1813 and had stood silently but powerfully between the Government and the subject in 1848. Moreover, the alteration was unnecessary. Its utmost effect was to raise the standing force to about 210,000 men. But the same result would be produced by recruiting the army annually with 86,000, instead of 63,000 men, for which statisticians showed the population furnished abundant materials. In that case, and if the time of service in the Landwehr had been set down as extending to the thirty-sixth year of the age of every Prussian, the latter body might have been preserved, the time of service in the army under the flag retained at two years, and that in the reserve limited to three years. It involved an increase of the funded debt of nearly ten millions of thalers, and of the annual budget of three millions. It would strengthen all the absolutistic elements of the body politic, especially the landed gentry, who were its most ardent supporters, because they wanted lieutenancies for their younger sons. It would tempt the crown to a coup d'état, by employing the very instrument with which such deeds are consummated, the standing army.

These were weighty objections, yet not absolutely unanswerable. If the Landwehr could only be preserved at the expense of the national greatness, it had ceased to be a sacred institution. The proposed increase was not larger in proportion than that of the population since 1813, the date of its establishment. The wealth of the country had increased still more rapidly. The sprigs of the nobility were hardly sufficient in number to hold all the commissions. It would have been easy to stipulate for the infusion of an increased element of commoners into the body, and to abolish such little abuses as might have given the officers of noble birth some slight advantages. The fear of a coup d'état was hardly warranted in view of the fact that these soldiers were in uniform for three years only, and returned to the body of the citizens from which they came; that the persons to be introduced into the army were the same who would otherwise form the very Landwehr on whom the Liberals placed so much reliance; the proposed army would have been practically the people in arms, and a very bad utensil for an assault upon its own liberties; and the very increase demanded by the Government would necessitate further revenues, and thereby make the Government more dependent on the Assembly.

There could not have been a fairer subject for discussion, and for one of those adjustments between the Crown and the legislature contemplated by the theory of constitutional governments. To obtain the desired appropriations, the Government should have cheerfully made concessions in regard to the organization of the army itself, and on collateral subjects, such as the liberty of the press, of public meetings, of trade, or of migration, then before the public. In return for such a concession, the Assembly should have been liberal, for their liberality would have redounded to their own advantage. But the Prussian mind appears to be disqualified for such a transaction. In this instance the King began by introducing his reform without consulting the Chambers. This might have been adroit had it been followed up by a civil explanation, an exposition of the greatness of the emergency and a request for indemnity. But, instead of this, the Crown announced the measure as an act of superior wisdom, in which the people were bound to acquiesce without a murmur. The lower house, refusing to sanction the change as a permanent one, endeavored to compromise the matter by authorizing a loan for extraordinary expenses for the war establishment, without specifying them. The ministers took the money, and invested it in a reorganization of the army, which, in some subordinate respects, was even less congenial to the wishes of the people than the scheme originally proposed by the ministers, but rejected. Notwithstanding this insolent breach of faith, the Chamber made another effort at compromise in the shape of an amendment substituting a term of two years for that of three years, for which the Government scheme required every man to serve in the regular army. The proposal was rejected on the ground that, although two years are sufficient to impart the mere military instruction which is needed, they are not sufficient to imbue the recruit with that proper sense of his "profession" which the Government think it necessary to instil, or, in other words, that an army of soldiers who had not ceased to be citizens for over two years was not sufficiently dangerous to the liberties of the people. Such an avowal removed the last remnant of solicitude for a compromise, and the deputies flatly refused to pass the appropriation bill. The Assembly was dissolved and a new one elected, in which, however, the Government found itself with only nine supporters out of three hundred and fifty, and which, of course, was even less tractable than its predecessor. The ministry, now headed by Count Bismark Schoenhausen, met their refusal to vote moneys with an unqualified declaration that they would thereafter dispense with the advice or assistance of the Chamber on any and every subject. The upper house sustained the Government's appropriation bill, but that vote is admitted on all hands to be of no more avail than would be a similar proceeding on the part of one of our State senates.

Such is the present condition of Prussia: a cabinet practically exercising irresponsible power, but unable to levy a new tax or to borrow a dollar; a representative assembly unanimous against the ministry, but at present unable to displace them or to control their policy. The turn of affairs will arrive when the financial necessities of the Government will admit of no further delay. Then they must either advertise for a loan on their own responsibility, or make terms with the Assembly to obtain their sanction. If they do the former, will the capitalists of Europe heed them? Refusals have already come in, not from the Rothschilds only, but from Erlanger, the noted Jew who brought the rebel cotton loan into circulation. One of their latest operations was to raise thirty-two millions of thalers from the Cologne and Minden Railroad Company by releasing to them the right of the Government to buy out their stock—an instance at once of the great prosperity of the corporation and of the difference in the views of public law prevailing in that country and in our own, where such a step could not possibly be taken without legislative interposition. The amount of money in question is sufficient to defray the extraordinary expenses of the Government for several years. Thus a matter of military administration has been converted into a great political question. The conflict has increased in bitterness and animosity since the fall of 1862, when the helm of state passed into the hands of Bismark, the most reckless political gambler ever at the head of the foreign affairs of a great state. He is not without some of the qualities which go to make a statesman, such as tenacity in adhering to a line of policy once adopted, "masterly inactivity" where positive action is not available, and, above all, a degree of pluck unheard of in a Prussian minister, and in singular contrast to the Austro-Russian subserviency invariably observed for more than half a century. So little were the diplomatists prepared for this new development that great successes have been achieved in the Schleswig-Holstein question. Had this man appeared in the days of the Abbé Bernis, of Robert Walpole, or Kaunitz, he would have made a permanent mark on the history of his times; but he is destined to signal failure in attempting to brave the public opinion of the nineteenth century. The latest arrivals report an interview between him and Louis Napoleon, of whom he claims to be the pupil, but who will make a victim of him if he can.

He has done great harm to the position of Prussia in the politics of Germany. All the prejudices of the Southern Germans against this power are aggravated to their highest pitch when they see it in the hands of such a man. Nevertheless, Germany will never be united except under Prussian leadership. So much the more important is it for the Liberals of Prussia to cast off this incubus, and restore their country to its legitimate position as the champion of liberal principles. They can do so with a tithe of the audacity evinced by their opponents. Perhaps the real mission of the present régime has been to educate the Liberals, by the force of example, out of the timidity which has heretofore frustrated all their efforts.

NATIONAL CHARITIES.

If it has not charity, a nation, like a man, is nothing. If it does not provide, through its government or its people, for such of its members as are unable to provide for themselves, it may be great in all other things, great in winning victories, great in extending its boundaries or its resources, great in enlarging its institutions and equalizing its classes, but because it does not do this one thing, and relieve those who have a claim to its relief, it is a small nation—small in the worst sense, and its shame exceeds its glory.

Lament as we will, for the sake of the suffering classes themselves, that there are so many of them to suffer, and that their number increases rather than diminishes, at least to the sight, if not in reality, there need be no lamentation for the nation that is bound to relieve them. It can have no debt so heavy, no expenditure so severe, that the addition of the few millions to its annual outlay can be a pecuniary burden of any magnitude. It can have no such strain upon its time or its energy that the labor of ministering to the necessities of the needy can be a cause of exhaustion. What it gives in money or care is no more than it can easily spare, and no one thinks of condoling with a people because of these demands upon them. The demands to be lamented are of quite another description. Nor is the national life complete without this element of suffering on the one hand and of ministering on the other. A nation ablaze with prosperity is a wearying spectacle to itself as to all around it:

> "Shining on, shining on, by no shadow made tender," it needs softening; it needs that sense which the Italians call simpatico, as much an essential to national as to individual character.

Enough, and perhaps too much, of this on a subject which has been handled until it is pretty well worn. The only excuse for saying as much is that we may not be misunderstood when we urge the danger of overdoing our charities, or of so administering them as to make it doubtful whether they are really charities.

Among the mistakes into which we have fallen, is that of organizing our charitable institutions upon a basis of gregariousness. We build one house, and fill it with orphans; another, and fill it with criminals. We scour the state for inebriates or lunatics, offenders or vagrants, and crowd them, according to their classes, into huge establishments, where the individual is lost in the mass, and the influence upon the whole is the only influence to bear upon its parts. A system of this kind may be necessary in particular cases, especially in certain sorts of hospitals, where the sufferers must be collected in order to receive the succor of which they are in daily need from the skilful hands of the physician or the nurse. But there are, or ought to be, exceptions; and admitting them, the rule should be all the stronger that the members of a community in an abnormal state should be treated separately rather than collectively, with reference to that which makes each instance abnormal, and with the purpose of toning it down, and allowing it to subside as much as possible into the general condition of the community at large. To effect this, the sufferers, instead of being herded together, should be, in the majority of cases, kept apart, detained at their natural homes, if they have any, or placed in adopted homes, if these are required, where they can live like their fellow-beings, and share the associations and impressions which do more than anything human to relieve the trials of this life, alike for the fortunate and the unfortunate.

This is far too large a topic to enter upon here in any detail. But there is one illustration of these general principles, one that has prompted the writing of this article, upon which we beg leave to be heard a little longer.

At the close of a war so severe to those engaged in it as that through which we have passed, a large number of men, once able-bodied, have become disabled, and some of them so entirely disabled as to depend upon others for support or pecuniary assistance. Many of them, by far the larger number, will find the succor they need among their kindred, the pension received from the Government supplying them with pecuniary means, and the gracious ministrations of home supplying all else that is required in their behalf. But there are others whose homes are broken up, perhaps in consequence of the war, perhaps for other and sadder reasons; and these men, however pensioned, are not cared for as they should be until something more than a pension is provided for them, something that may take the place of a home and soothe the weary frame and the shattered life with watchful attention and sympathy. For such as these, the martyrs above all other martyrs to our cause, the nation stands ready at this moment to do what justice as well as charity demands. What shall be done? Shall a so-called Home, a vast establishment in the form if not the name of a Chelsea or a Greenwich Hospital, be built, furnished, and officered, where our wounded, maimed, and dying heroes shall spend the remnant of their days? Shall they be kept by themselves without other companionship than that which they can give one another, without other sympathies than those which spring from the well-fought field or the suffering which set in for them when the sun went down upon their victory? Or shall they be placed, each in his own neighborhood, if not his own home, among those who, living like the rest of us, will help these sufferers to live like the rest of us, and to be distingushed from those around them, not by being enclosed within the walls of an asylum, but only by the marks they bear of having suffered what others did not, perhaps would not, suffer for their country?

The recent experience of Greenwich Hospital may help us to decide these questions upon practical as well as general grounds. The pensioners of this great naval asylum, hitherto supposed to be the most contented if not the most active of their class, on being offered the privilege of leaving the hospital and returning to their families or to quarters of their own choosing, with the out-pension which they had relinquished on entering the hospital and an additional allowance of two shillings a day, so generally availed themselves of the offer that none but infirm or aged pensioners are said to remain in the Hospital. The gain to the retiring pensioners is clear enough. That to the Hospital itself consists, not only in being relieved from the care of those preferring to be cared for elsewhere, but in the great pecuniary saving to the funds of the institution; for though it pays the pensions of its former inmates, it saves many thousand pounds sterling a year in consequence of their withdrawal.

Let us trust that this step, which has been taken in correction of mistakes made in England, may prevent similar mistakes from being made in the United States.

THE ONE HUMANITY.

The phrase which is now used as a rallying cry by the Democratic party, "that this is a white man's country," and which they are seeking to embody in their policy towards the South, expresses the very lowest conception of government.

It is a low conception of government that it exists merely for protection; in other words, to keep the hands of one man from invading the person or the property of another. The true reason of political society is the education and elevation of our humanity. It is not merely τὸ ζῆν, but τὸ εὖ ζῆν, as Aristotle so tersely expresses it—not merely to live, but to live well. The true political economy is not wealth, nor commerce, nor works of internal improvement, nor anything that enters into what is commonly called national prosperity, except as subordinate to a nobler aim, and that is, to carry the human culture to its highest perfection—to produce the noblest style of man collectively and in each individual embraced in the political organization. It is to raise us from that low, selfish, animal, individualizing life which we live, each man by himself, into that higher and more rational humanity which we live with others. It is this alone that makes the state truly what a false and ignorant conservatism is so fond of styling it—a divine institution. It is this alone that can realize that old Socratic idea which is never to be surrendered—the glorious dream of a perfect earthly republic whose "rulers are philosophers," and in whose temple there dwelleth the "perfect righteousness." It is this alone that can raise to its highest dignity the state on earth, by making it one, at last, with the upper politeuma, or church "that cometh down from God out of heaven."

This is the Bible doctrine of the state. Such, too, however improperly conceived, was the view of the great thinkers of antiquity. With them, however, it had one most serious and vital defect. They founded the state too much, or too exclusively we might say, on race; and hence their failure. Christianity has changed this by bringing in a new principle; and now human political institutions have another trial, with a better, though it may be long a delayed, hope. It has brought out and placed in the front that glorious truth which Paul preached on Mars Hill, in the midst of the race-bigoted Athenians: "God hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell upon all the face of the earth." The aim of the Christian state is no longer to make the best Greeks, or the best Romans, or the best Anglo-Saxons, but the best men. It is no longer a "white" man's government, any more than it is a red man's or a black man's. All such preposterous assumptions stamp it as anti-Christian, and forfeit its claim to be regarded as a vicegerency of God. If we may use the language of the mart and the manufactory, the great business of the state is to turn out the best specimens of the article homo. In other and better words may we say: its lofty ideal, its divine mission, is to help all the weak, to lift up all the fallen, to raise to the highest culture of which he is capable every son of Adam that breathes upon its territory.

This is not a theme for mere essay writing. It involves the greatest and most practical question now before this nation. We boast of having gone beyond others in social and political science, but we have come at last to a place where the claim is to be most solemnly tested. This question of race is put before us as a stone of stumbling, or a rock of exaltation. It is for the rising or the falling of our Israel. We have a glorious call to the performance of the true mission of a Christian state. Do we feel that glory? Have we any true sense of the honor that God is putting upon us in appointing us to such a trial, such a mission—more distinctly announced to us than ever before to any nation under heaven? Over and over again, in every form but one, have we set forth the principle of human equality before the law. We have boasted of our land as the free home of all races. We have insulted other nations in the vehemence of our declamation. And now are we brought face to face with a question that will test it all. We are reluctant to concede to the African what we boast of giving to others—what we almost force upon others presenting no higher claims, apparently, of intellectual or of moral worth.

Why this odious distinction as against one race? It is because the loathsome trail of slavery has passed over us, leaving its foul slime upon its immediate victims and producing everywhere a misgiving as to their proper humanity. It has tainted the national mind. The doubt is openly avowed by some; it lies as an unsatisfied query in the minds of others; it lingers unconsciously, or semi-consciously, with many whose philanthropy or political consistency holds them back from confessing it even to themselves; it haunts the soul as a ghostly prejudice, even when philosophy and religion have made us reject it as a dogma. We do not fully and heartily believe that the negro is a man. We could not act or reason as we do unless this were the case. Our moral world is not fully persuaded of it, notwithstanding the wreck of all true morality that must result from the belief, once thoroughly popularized, that men, or any that have seemingly the physical and ethical characteristics of men, are really animals of distinct and graded species. Our religious world is held back from its hearty practical acknowledgment, notwithstanding the havoc which both reason and conscience tell us the contrary opinion, when it has once settled down into the common mind, must make in our Biblical and Christian theology.

Were it not for this, we could not treat the colored man as we do in our social and religious relations; we could not bear the moral and political inconsistency; we could not face either the world or our own convictions; we should have to shut our Bibles; we could not read, or bear to hear read, our Declaration of Independence. Thus are we compelled in self-defence to dehumanize the negro. It is demanded as an opiate to conscience. If he is truly a man, as we are men, then are we so greatly guilty. Even the vilest party discipline would have to yield to the claim of acknowledged manhood. There is a party among us that has reached the minimum of littleness, and the maximum of loathsomeness, in making the scorn and debasement of a crushed race the sole foundation of their political edifice. Its column has no other base than the bruised head of the negro. It is a party that has squandered everything else that ever had the semblance of principle, and now this cry of "nigger" is the only capital remaining to it. Yet even this party, low and hard as it has become, could not keep together its own ignorant followers against a clear and settled recognition of the humanity of those whom they would thus treat as outcasts from the political and social polity. Even the Copperhead Democrat would become ashamed of himself; he could not face the questions that would arise if stripped of his vile plea (whether believed by himself or not) of the African's want of a proper manhood. So true it is that a false feeling outside of this party is the aliment that gives it all its poisonous vitality.

Is the negro a man? Say what we will, this is the real issue in the controversy respecting him. It underlies all others. It affects our reasoning in respect to all other aspects of the debate; it colors our speech, it gives a hue to our thought, it weakens our best arguments, it gives strength to our worst fallacies. We say it boldly, and appeal to the public consciousness. It is everywhere, and most truly was it said by General Howard, that "nothing but the spirit of Christ can overcome it." Strange that such a declaration should have been left to be made by one of our major-generals, only to be denounced by a republican press as canting and sectarian!

We must meet the issue fairly, and settle it once and for ever, before we can deal with others that are collateral to it. We do not sufficiently think how vital and fundamental this question is. We are evading it. Some do this consciously, many unconsciously, and without any distinct idea of the nature and results of their reasoning. We talk humanely, or affect to do so, without seeming to be aware that the style we adopt, the arguments we employ, though seemingly in his favor, are really dehumanizing the subject to which they are applied. We do not speak or write thus concerning any other classes among us, however low we may think them in the outward social scale. Even when we advocate the cause of the African, we do it in a manner that would be thought insulting and utterly undemocratic in any other case. We use the language of masters and owners. The style of our ordinary questions betrays this. It is not what is due to them, as men equally with ourselves coming under the reciprocal obligationof the Golden Rule, but "what shall we do with them," what shall we give or concede, or what shall we withhold. Who would thus defend Irish citizenship, or the admission of Irishmen to our railroad cars, or to our churches, or to our communion-tables? The way in which we speak to the colored man, and of the colored man, shows an unconscious yielding to the anti-christian prejudice we are striving to overcome. Frederick Douglass said that Mr. Lincoln was the only man he knew that could talk to a colored person without some appearance of condescension. The fact reveals one of the noblest traits in the noble character of our martyred President. But the general observation of the shrewd and intelligent Douglass was undoubtedly true. There is a timidity, an apologetic pleading, that we would not think of adopting if we were advocating a right grounded on the clear conscious acknowledgment that those who are thus defended are really men, and have the same rights which our religious code, no less than our Declaration of Independence, challenges for all men.

We might dwell here, or we may dwell at some other time, on some of the fearful consequences that have been barely alluded to, of the effect which the leaving this issue unsettled, or settled wrong, would have upon the most important aspects of human belief—its debasement of our politics, its degradation of our psychology, the ruin it would make in our theology, its undermining of Christian belief, its tendency to darken even natural religion, with all the proofs it is supposed to offer of human dignity and human immortality —all gone the moment we begin to make essential distinctions in humanity, or to treat it at all as a mere matter of degree, or to take one step downwards on that Stygian ladder that shall connect our human, through successive gradations, with all the brutal animality that lies below. The degradation of one part is the degradation of all, and hence the thought we would labor to impress, that every man has both a selfish and a fraternal interest in the elevation of every other man.

REDUCTION OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Six months ago one million and eighty thousand men were borne upon the pay-rolls of the army of the United States. Before the end of the present month, this almost inconceivable number will be reduced to less than one hundred thousand, and by the time Congress meets fully one million names will be stricken from the lists of the disbursing bureaus of the War Department. And, apace with the disbanding of this immense host, reductions and retrenchments on a like vast scale have been made in all the branches of the military service by sale and discharge. In the Quartermaster's and Commissary Departments an army of citizen employees has been dismissed. By the former no less than two hundred and twenty-five thousand horses and mules, and some fifteen thousand army wagons and ambulances, have been disposed of at public sale. One hundred and fifty steam and sailing vessels owned by the Government have been sold, and over five hundred steam and other craft, chartered for army-transportation, discharged. The hundreds of locomotives and cars used by the Government on Southern railroads have also been sold; the numerous and extensive workshops of every description in operation at all the bases of supply have been shut up; the Medical Department has emptied and closed its one hundred and ninety general hospitals, with a capacity of one hundred and twenty thousand beds, and sold its useless property. The Ordnance Department has discharged thousands of hands engaged in the manufacture of ammunition at the public arsenals and armories, and has stopped work in many private foundries engaged day and night in the casting and finishing off of artillery. And so of every bureau and department subordinate to the War Office.

The Government justly maintains that the history of no other nation furnishes a parallel to the rapidity of organization with which hundreds of thousands of men were, every year of the war, brought into the field. If it deserves credit for the truly wonderful expeditiousness with which it organized armies and supplied them, with admirable forethought and unstinted liberality, with all the necessary appliances for successful warfare, it is also entitled to no small meed of praise for the energy, order, and quickness with which, upon the return of peace, it undertook and carried out the gigantic work of relieving the public treasury at the earliest possible moment of the burden of so enormous a military establishment. A task of such proportions was never so well performed in so short a time, and the Republic can be no less proud of the comparative quiet, regularity, and despatch of the disbanding of its mighty armies than of the enthusiasm and alacrity with which great hosts of loyal citizens arrayed themselves under its banners for the struggle to maintain the integrity of the nation. The public at large can have no adequate conception of the amount of labor involved in this undertaking. The Quartermaster's Department has transported some seven hundred thousand men from every part of the Union to their respective homes since April last. In the same time the Pay Department has disbursed three hundred millions of dollars. As every officer and man and every citizen employee of the million discharged can be said to have a separate account with the Government, the intricacy and toil of examining and adjusting the whole mass are almost overwhelming. This one incident of the work of disbanding sufficiently illustrates its magnitude and difficulty.

In thus closing up the work of the rebellion, the Secretary of War and Lieutenant-General Grant have earned as great honor as during the continuance of the war. Both were equally impressed with the practicability, in view of the complete destruction of the resisting power of the rebellious States, as well as with the necessity, in view of the condition of the public finances, of reducing the military establishment of the country with the least possible delay to a numerical minimum, and both have acted upon this conviction with their usual thoroughness and vigor. As the fruit of their joint labors they will be able to show, in their annual reports to Congress, a much greater reduction of public expenditures on account of the army than has been anticipated by the most sanguine. The annual appropriation which the Secretary will ask for his department will, in all probability, not exceed sixty millions of dollars—less than one-twentieth of what the Government had to expend during the last year of the war.

But there is a dark as well as a bright side to this picture of the rapid dwindling away of the loyal armies to so low a figure. The general orders issued within the last fortnight, which direct the mustering out of a large number of white infantry regiments, all the troops serving on the Plains, all the volunteer cavalry on duty east of the Mississippi, and all such colored troops, in the various military departments, as are not absolutely required by the commanding generals, will reduce the aggregate remaining in the service, as already stated, to about eighty thousand men. Of these at least ten thousand are non-effectives, and twenty thousand more will be needed for garrison duty in forts and cities of the loyal States and on the Pacific coast, leaving thus only fifty thousand men for the preservation of order in the rebel States. Of this number ten thousand will be needed to garrison the large cities of the South. If the rest were to be equally distributed over disloyal territory, but a corporal's guard would fall to each county. The question will present itself at once to every mind, whether this force will be sufficient to ensure the tranquillity of the rebel States, and the protection due to their emancipated people. The spirit manifested by their white population, and the late actions of the several State conventions, are hardly calculated to remove all apprehensions on this score. The withdrawal from the subdued States of fully one half of the troops stationed therein, though proposed by General Grant and approved by the Secretary of War, on the sole ground of economy, is tantamount to a relaxation of military rule, and hence to a political measure. It is, like President Johnson's reconstruction policy, an experiment, dependent on the good faith of the people of the South for success. And, while we devoutly hope and pray that its working may realize the expectations of its originators, we cannot help thinking that the protective powers exercised by General Howard's agents for the benefit of the freed people will be sadly weakened by it. The source and support of their authority has been military force. That gone, or so reduced as to deprive it of the power of intimidation, we fear their usefulness will be more and more impaired until Congress comes to their relief.

"EARNESTNESS."

The North Carolina Times, a journal devoted, like most other journals at the South, to the President's policy of reconstruction, has recently taken us to task for our comments on the doings and sayings of Governor Perry, of South Carolina, and prefaces its rebuke by the following observations on the general character of The Nation:

"Among the many daily and weekly journals of the revolutionary school which are to be found in our country there is no one, perhaps, more ably conducted than The Nation, which is issued in the city of New York. Every article which appears in its columns, bearing at all upon the Administration or its policy, is gotten up with a degree of ability, closeness of reasoning, and finely laid-off line of argument, which cannot fail of attracting attention, and, to a certain extent, commanding respect. It assails the President of the United States upon every conservative point salient in his avowed policy towards the South, and does so in a manner free from the gross and unrefined style of other but more widely-known radical journals. There is always a something in its style which impresses the reader with a conviction that he is reading from a journal which is devoted to the Administration, but which has earned the right to correct, in the policy of the President, what is not in accordance with the writer's views of the political requirement. The incautious reader is apt to be led into deep error by this sheet, and it is therefore the more dangerous to the peace and quiet of the country at large, and to that people in particular now trying to re-establish proper relations to the Union."

How far the complimentary portion of the foregoing is well-founded, we must, of course, leave our readers to determine; but we cannot, for our own part, help seeing in it, coming from such a source, a strong testimony to the efficacy of the policy to which we have from the outset endeavored to adhere as well as the necessities of journalism would let us. Complete accuracy of statement is not always possible in a newspaper, but it is always possible to strive after it, and to exhibit a proper sense of its value. So, also, it is not always possible, at great exciting crises, to avoid the occasional use of language which opponents may consider wanting in moderation. But it is possible to show dislike of violence and exaggeration, to show that you know them to be what they really are, forms of falsehood and injustice, which, before the fight is half over, are pretty sure to do as much execution in your own ranks as in those of the enemy. These things we have endeavored to do, though at the risk of misconception. Our course has, in fact, led some of our contemporaries to lament in a piteous manner over our "want of earnestness."

The great object of talking and writing is, we believe, not so much to show other people how one feels, as to affect their feelings, and the display of one's own feelings is only useful in political discussion in so far as it accomplishes this purpose. Two-thirds of the rant that one meets with on the platform and in the press is really due to the intense desire of orators and writers to display their own points and put their own enthusiasm "on record," no matter what their influence may be on the public. We think for our part that the true test of excellence in writing and speaking is, after all, the effect it produces on those to whom it is addressed, and if this were more widely remembered, we should probably have fewer bursts of eloquence and displays of "fine frenzy," but all good causes would make much more rapid progress.

There is an opinion prevalent amongst many excellent friends of reform that no impression can be made on the American public without "strong writing," high coloring, exaggeration, and a fair amount of contempt for bare facts. We think this has always been a mistake, and we think it is now a greater mistake than ever. What the American public wants is common-sense, logic, clearness of statement, and a decent regard for the literal, unadorned truth, and it will not accept any amount of fine writing or "enthusiasm" in lieu of them. And strange as it may seem to some, it is possible to throw just as much "earnestness" into the use of these weapons as into that of any number of climaxes or tropes.

One of the grandest results of the war has been that it has opened all parts of the country to free speech. It has rendered it possible to advocate human rights, and to profess respect for man, as man, in any circle of society, without being considered a sectary or a visionary. It has interested immense numbers of people in all parts of the North in the general work of reform and in the progress of liberal ideas who never were interested in them before. It has awakened amongst whole classes of society, who were previously plunged in the hardest materialism, a respect and even a passion for "mere ideas." It has, too, given the whole country a keener appreciation than it ever possessed before of the value of facts, of the inevitable limits placed by time and space and circumstances to the realization of the noblest and most glowing aspirations. In other words, the public has lived half a century in the last four years. Experience, which many other nations have not won in as many generations, has been crowded into this small space, and one of the invariable results of experience is the development of a spirit of criticism, of a disposition to weigh and consider as well as to feel.

It seems to us that, in all attempts to influence the public mind for good purposes, count must be taken of these changes. The tactics which might have been justifiable when the enemy was entrenched behind rigid party lines would hardly be suitable after his organization has been in some measure broken up, and he has come down to meet us in the open field of fair discussion. We can get large numbers of people now to listen to the advocacy of principles to which a few years ago their hearts, as well as their ears, were impenetrably closed—people, too, whose influence on the national progress is most potential; but they will only listen on condition that they are addressed in the words of soberness and truth. And we confess that to us the work of permeating American society with real democratic feeling, in the highest and Christian sense of the word, is far too important to allow us ever to feel tempted to endanger or retard its success by cheap displays of rhetorical "earnestness."

THE TEMPER OF THE SOUTH.

THE following letters are from the correspondence of the commercial agent, now travelling at the South, from whom we have already quoted so freely. It would be difficult to exaggerate their interest and importance:

NEW ORLEANS, October 1, 1865.

DEAR SIR: Up to this time I have refrained from expressing any opinion in relation to the temper, policy, or designs of the people at the South, except as regards their relations toward the freedmen. I abstained purposely, and for two reasons: first, I desired ample time and opportunity in order to form an intelligent and impartial idea of their tone of feeling under the new and peculiar circumstances in which they have been placed; and next, I should not now have ventured to obtrude my opinion upon you, had you not done me the honor to request it. I have, as is natural under the circumstances, occupied myself in a very considerable degree in observing their general state of mind, in listening to their plans and hopes and fears for the future, and, in fact, in attempting to understand their present position and future prospects. In travelling about as I have from one section of the country to the other, I have been able to compare opinions, and, as you know, I have had peculiar and favorable opportunities for ascertaining the views they have in common. I have endeavored to trace the motives from which they have acted and which now animate them, and their real purpose for the future, if they have one. In giving you my opinion now, it is proper to say that I have taken no one individual as a criterion of the whole, and have judged them only by the opinions I find they are generally agreed upon; neither have I any one's statement for their thoughts and actions. My opinions, deductions, and conclusions are derived from my own experience and observation among them, and whether they shall be confirmed or denied by others, are, notwithstanding, my honest and sincere convictions.

My opportunities for mixing among them and arriving at their real and true sentiments have been considerable and frequent, and I have made use of them to the full extent of my ability. I now propose to write you a letter, or letters, giving you my full opinion, with all the conclusions I have been able to arrive at. If any statement in it may appear to you worth making public, you have my free permission to use my name as authority.

One needs but a short time to remark, among this people, that while the war has impoverished them, reducing the most wealthy among them almost to very paupers, and bringing all down to one common level, so far as goods and money are concerned, it has yet given an immense impetus to the whole Southern country, developed a degree of latent force and energy among the inhabitants that was, to say the least, quite unexpected, and has tended directly towards making them more of a self-supporting, self-reliant community than before the war, by the consolidation of their interests and resources. Nor is the movement likely to cease with the war. The poor white goes back to his home with his mind enlarged and strengthened, and capable of grasping ideas which he never even attempted to comprehend before the war. His discipline has improved him immensely, so far as his capacity is concerned; he is far more ready to reason for himself. The false ideas prevalent throughout the South in relation to the dignity or *in*dignity of labor, have been done away with almost entirely, and I have met and can mention the names of planters' sons, who were esteemed to be worth millions before the war, who are not ashamed to perform duties they once considered as degrading, such as acting as overseers, clerks, etc., etc., even to the learning of mechanical trades. I have met men who have gone to work since the close of the war at fifty cents per diem, cutting fire-wood and drawing water, who once owned their plantations and had many slaves. I believe they honestly accept and intend to abide by the emancipation of the negro. Many of them speak of it as if a great load had been lifted off them. Their position in regard to slavery appears to be this: They felt that they needed the producing labor of the negro, and that under the slave code they were sure of it, in a high degree, while under a free-labor system, at the best, it could not be made available to such an extent for many years. Besides, they say they were born in this country, and found the blacks here, and even though slavery might be morally wrong, yet what could they do? By emancipation they almost universally believe the inevitable destruction of the blacks is accomplished. According to their theory, the negro, if left to himself, will relapse into barbarism, and, as he cannot take care of himself, he will, in time, die out, even if his exit is not hastened by a war of races, which almost all regard as possible, and very many, perhaps the majority, as inevitable. They say that for the negro's sake, quite as much as for their own, they would have perpetuated the institution of slavery. Many of them, while perfectly willing to admit that it degraded the white man, assert that it brought the negro higher in the social scale than he ever could have otherwise attained. These say that in emancipating the negro the North has pronounced his death-warrant, and that his blood must be on the head of those who accomplished his destruction. They are all anxious to supply their places with white labor.

If any grand colonization project should be started, the Southerners would all favor it, as they say now all they wish is "to get shet of them;" that is, to get them out of the country. But while I am able to say that they have made up their minds that emancipation is a fact, and not to be avoided, I am obliged to state my earnest opinion that so far as secession is concerned—that is, the doctrine of State rights—it is more deeply rooted than ever among them. They are perfectly united in the belief that the division of this country is both right from a moral stand-point, and politic as a measure of expediency. They have simply changed their base from the battle-field to the ballot-box, believing, as they very frankly admit, that greater triumphs await them there than they could ever hope for in the field. In almost every house hangs the old, worn Confederate uniform, which is displayed with pride and satisfaction to all comers. So far from repenting of the stand they took, they glory in it. They regret the result and their non-success, it is true, but not one in a thousand will admit they were in the wrong.

Many profess to deplore the policy their leaders saw fit to adopt; in fact, almost all take exceptions to it in whole or in part, ascribing their failure to this or that measure having, or not having, been adopted; but so far as my experience extends none attack the principles they professed. A favorite idea with them is, that if they had not set up a new government, but fought for their rights under the old flag, making the revolution a national one, they would have succeeded at once, and could then have reconstructed the Union to suit themselves.

They have returned, as they themselves take every opportunity of asserting, because they had to, not because they wished to. Ask almost any man here if he believes he would be better off out of the Union than in it, and he is surprised at the question. "Of course they would be better off." They return under compulsion, and desire it to be so understood. Their position is precisely this—they coincide with their military leaders, who believed, AS A CHOICE OF EVILS, it was better to return to the Union than to continue the war. The only concession they are willing sincerely to make is that of slavery, which they see has been ground out of existence by the war. It was a measure of policy that induced them to give up, not a conviction of duty. They are angry with Jefferson Davis, because he did not accede to Lincoln's terms at Fortress Monroe. They argue that at least ninety-five in every two hundred votes at the North are sure to be thrown in their favor, and they can now rule the Union by giving up, which is cheaper than to persist in their idea of a separate government. That idea, however, is only laid aside for a time. Every boy at the South is being educated in the belief that the relations the South to-day sustains toward the North, are the same as those of Hungary or Venetia toward Austria, or of Poland to Russia. They bide their time. They have adopted for their motto "Patience and shuffle the cards." The snake, so far from being killed, is barely "scotched." Meantime, they deem it better to rule in the Union than to serve in the Confederate army.

As Hamilcar made Hannibal swear eternal enmity against old Rome, so every Southern matron is bringing up her children to hate and despise the Federal Union. The abolition of slavery is but an incident to them, a part of the price they have to pay; the idea of a separate and independent nationality is deeply rooted in the Southern heart. It is strongest among the youngest. You need not expect to see the Fourth of July celebrated in this portion of the country. Their preachers are among the most persistent, and all the influence of the pulpit is on the side of disunion. Their professors second their efforts from their colleges and seminaries. How long this will continue it is difficult to say; but it does not look as though it would die out in a day. I will write more on this subject in a few days.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

NEW ORLEANS, October 2, 1865.

DEAR SIR: In my letters to you I have given it as my opinion that the South have made up their minds to accept the emancipation of the blacks as a fait accompli, as something that is done and cannot be undone. It may well appear, however, that many of their arguments and resolutions would seem to squint at the re-establishment of slavery. Thus, when they deny that the President possessed the constitutional right to issue his proclamation of emancipation (and that being the case, his decrees upon the subject are not binding and of no effect), it would be quite reasonable and natural to suppose that they drew the inference that slavery still exists of right; but there is another explanation to this: The whole South is in league to obtain compensation for the slaves.

This is what prevents Kentucky from adopting the Constitutional Amendment, and this is the secret of all their speeches and resolves. As to the fact itself, it is indisputable. Slavery is dead, and nothing less than a miracle could re-establish it. If the North, however, has any fears upon the subject, they have only to muster out the black troops and send them South, and, my word for it, there will be much more danger of the blacks enslaving the whites in these cotton States, than of the opposite. The South to-day so far mistake the situation as to suppose that, by pretending to believe the institution not yet defunct, and that it is still possible to revive it, they can frighten the Northern people into compensation for emancipation. They are confirmed in this idea by the action of New Jersey, Delaware, and Kentucky. I have heard many a Southern man bitterly accuse Jefferson Davis of neglecting to accept the terms Lincoln offered at Fortress Monroe, and when I asked what those terms were, they answered: "Gradual emancipation and payment to be made to the owners of slaves." When I said the whole South was in league, I should have said, the whole body of slave-owners. Those who did not own slaves, however, are still the ready tools and accomplices of those who did.

The devotion of the Southern people to, and their belief in, the reigning class, can hardly be exaggerated. It is my firm belief that if either General Lee or Wade Hampton should raise the standard of revolt to-morrow, thousands upon thousands would flock to their support. Not that there is the slightest reason to suspect such a movement. On the contrary, the Southern people have made up their minds not to do any more fighting if they can possibly help it; but they have that confidence in the individuals I have mentioned that they would waive their own opinions in a moment. This does not extend to their prominent political men, most of whom are distrusted, and some hated as badly as "the Yankees." As to their affection for their military leaders, you will find proof in the elections at Richmond and South Carolina. No man has a better claim to their sympathy, and none stand a better chance of election, than those who were the last to give up. Motives of policy may induce them to nominate others, but the fact remains as I have stated. I repeat, that General Lee and Wade Hampton are the two most popular and best loved men in the South to-day. I have heard but one disparaging remark made of General Lee since I was at the South, and that was in this connection: I was riding one night in a hack across the gap in a railway, made by Wilson, and, as usual, the conversation turned on political affairs and the condition and prospects of the Southern people. One man said that General Lee stood the best chance for the next Presidency,—by the way, that is a very prevalent idea here at the South,—when another remarked that he would rather have Andrew Johnson. I was curious to know why, and enquired. He replied that "he had but little confidence in Lee since he favored negro soldiers, and in his opinion he was not much better than a Black Republican."

The old proverb, you see, holds good with this people, and these "men convinced against their will, are of the same opinion still."

In my next letter I will try and indicate what I believe to be the policy of the Southern leaders, and what objects they are trying to achieve. I will mention here, however, that Southern people can scarcely credit the possibility of their representatives being refused admittance to Congress, and as to negro suffrage, they will never give their consent to it. The planters might, but the prejudice among the middle and poorer classes is too great for them to encounter, and, at the best, they will only remain passive.

I have the honor to remain, very respectfully, yours,

New Orleans, October 4, 1865.

Dear Sir: The Southern people, it appears to me, are, and have been, far more in the habit of implicitly trusting their political leaders, than the people of the North. They are less disposed to criticize the actions of those in authority until the event has proved them right or wrong. This results, no doubt, in a great degree, from the fact that their periodical literature (newspapers, etc.) is far inferior in amount of distribution to that at the North. It is no uncommon thing here for men of cultivation and refinement to permit weeks to pass without taking up a newspaper. I mention this fact because I am fully persuaded that the disposition of the Southern people is to be affected permanently by the way their former leaders are treated by the North. For instance, it would be the worst possible policy to hang or otherwise severely punish Jefferson Davis. To-day there is a strong feeling at the South against the man. They claim that by his self-will and obstinacy he has done more to injure the Confederate cause than any ten of their antagonists; now, if he is punished, he will as surely be canonized by the South as a martyr, as he will be for ever disliked by them if permitted to go free The quickest and surest and only way to conciliate the South, if it be their good-will that is sought, is to hold out such inducements to the leaders they still confide in, as shall cause them to represent to the Southern people that it is for their interest to accept the statu quo. The Southern people can be reached quickest through the medium of such men as R. E. Lee and Wade Hampton.

At present every one at the South is occupied in his personal and family interests. There are no political parties; very little coherence of opinion as to the policy best to be pursued. But I find among the knowing ones, particularly those who have been on to the North, and remained some time in New York or Washington, a sanguine belief that they can easily resume the reins of office, and these men are the only Unionists in the South to-day. You can depend upon it that the Southern States in the future will present one solid, unanimous front. Their leaders have them well in hand, and this is precisely what ninety-nine in every hundred of the men, women, and children believe sincerely as to the situation to-day: first, that the South of right possesses and always possessed the right of secession; secondly, that he war only proved that the North was the strongest, thirdly, that negro slavery was and is right, but has been abolished by the war. The Southerners are too smart not to see that slavery is dead, but many of them hope as long as the black race exists here to be able to hold it in a condition of practical serfdom. All expect the negro will be killed in one way or another by emancipation. The policy of those who will eventually become the leaders here at the South is, for the present, to accept the best they can get, to acquiesce in anything and everything, but to strain every nerve to regain the political power and ascendency they held under Buchanan. This they believe cannot be postponed longer than up to the next Presidential election. They will do all in their power to resist negro suffrage, to reduce taxation and expenditures, and would attack the national debt if they saw any reason to believe repudiation possible. They will continue to assert the inferiority of the African, and they would to-day, if possible, precipitate the United States into a foreign war, believing they could then re-assert and obtain their independence. They will, most of them, take any oaths you may cause to be adopted, and break them immediately, and without scruple. In one word, this people have placed themselves in resolute antagonism to the North, and this generation, at least, will always hate the Northern people, while the boys are being educated to the same idea. They will never, however, appeal to arms again, unless in the event of a division at the North, where they could be sure of the assistance of one side, or in case of a foreign war. They are bound now, as before, to rule or ruin, and if admitted to political power you will find out that what I write is true. The only way to make Union men of them is to appeal to their interests. Their sympathies are all one way, and they nearly all believe that the disintegration of this nation is accomplished already, and that the bonds that hold it together will soon snap apart from their own weight.

On the whole, looking at the affair from all sides, it amounts to just this: If the Northern people are content to be ruled over by the Southerners, they will continue in the Union; if not, the first chance they get they will rise again. I am, very respectfully, yours,

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

XV.

Raleigh, N. C., Oct. 16, 1865.

The North Carolina State Convention met at Raleigh, in the hall of the House of Commons, on the morning of Monday, the second of October, and, with praiseworthy despatch, in the course of six days performed all the work which they considered of paramount importance—annulled the secession ordinance of May 20, 1861, and, by a unanimous vote, passed an ordinance for ever prohibiting slavery within the State.

During the first two days nothing of interest took place, and there was little for the visitor to do but look about him. Like every other public structure—road, railroad, court-house, bridge, church—that I have seen in the South, the appearance of the capitol showed that for some years only necessary things have been done. Its paint is stained and dingy, the gilding is tarnished, and there is need of new furniture. The Commons Hall is a large square room with a semi-circular gallery on three sides, and a lofty dome-shaped ceiling, from which a chandelier depends. The seats of the members are disposed in the shape of a fan before the Speaker's chair, and the space behind them, beneath the gallery, at the sides and corners of the room, is called the lobby.

Against the wall on the right of the Speaker's chair hangs a full-length portrait of Washington, the only ornament of the hall. There is also a bronze statue of Washington in the capitol yard, the pedestal of which bears the initial letters G. W., A. L., and the inscription, "The saviours of their country." The festoons of mourning drapery are slipping from their fastenings, and some of the black cloth lies upon the ground.

The convention was a more imposing body than I had been expecting to see; for I had been assured by many gentlemen in the western counties that the members elect were all, as a matter of course, Union men; that most of them were, therefore, persons of little property and of no social standing; that the better class of people throughout the State had refrained from voting, and that, in point of ability, the convention would be the weakest ever assembled in North Carolina. A majority of the members wore the appearance of elderly farmers neither very wealthy nor very well educated. One delegate, for instance, said in private conversation: "What do you mean by pro-slavery and anti-slavery? I've always heard those two words, but I was always afraid to make use of 'em, for I did n't feel sure I should get 'em right." Many of them, I dare say, are unintelligent as well as uneducated; narrow-minded men, without the habit of thinking and dominated by illiberal prejudices. One of them said to me the other evening:

"The niggers are having a convention, a' n't they? What do they want? Equal rights, I suppose. How do they talk, anyhow? Going to vote, be they?"

"They do n't say much about voting. Their address is very moderate in its tone, but they ask for the right to testify in the courts. What do you think the convention will do in reference to that; grant it?"

"No, sir; they won't get that. It would n't do at all. No, sir."

"They say they must work for you, and make contracts with you, in order to live, and that nothing will be more frequent than disputes about work and wages."

"If I make a contract with a nigger, I want it to bind me just as much as him and him just as much as me. I do n't want anything but justice, and the contract ought to be fair for the nigger and fair for me, and I 'd live up to my agreement."

"But I suppose you know some men in your own neighborhood that won't live up to their contracts unless you go to law and make them—men that will only be just when justice is extorted from them."

Yes, he said, he knew men like that, and he proceeded to give me some instances, to which I listened, and then asked him what a negro could do in such a case as that he had detailed.

"I do n't know," he replied; "do n't know. That was a bad case."

"Why, you 'll have to let the negro give testimony, and so, as far as that will enable him, protect himself against such rascality and violence as you describe."

"Oh no," he repeated; "oh no; that won't do. The people won't have niggers giving evidence. They 'll never get that. The people won't have it;" and these remarks served him as an answer to all my arguments. But a good majority of the delegates seemed superior to the men of this stamp, and at least would have been able to find some reasons of some sort with which to fortify themselves in their prejudices. The spectator of its deliberations could not but conceive a favorable opinion of the ability of the convention as well as of its dignity and decorum. And though there were some little instances of indecorum, which, in a Northern assemblage of similar character, would have provoked animadversion or laughter, the dignified gravity of the convention remained quite undisturbed. For example, Mr. Giles Mebane, of Alamance, an elderly farmer in snuff-colored clothes, rises to address the house, and, during the delivery of his sensible remarks, holds gingerly between his finger and thumb a quid of tobacco taken from his mouth, a proceeding which leaves his speech unimpeded, though it perhaps takes away something from the freedom and energy of his gesticulation. On another day, Mr. Pool, the member from Bertie, leaving his seat, draws a chair into a convenient position in the lobby, and smokes a long-stemmed pipe within a few feet of the President, and in full view of the convention. Attracted by the scent of tobacco, Mr. Caldwell, of Guilford, also retires to the lobby, and, filling up a pipe with a still longer stem, takes a seat beside Mr. Pool, and, by expressive signs, not to disturb the orator of the moment, begs of him a little fire or a match. In their behavior to each other and to their officers, the delegates were, as a rule, exceedingly respectful; there was no personal crimination and recrimination, and, I believe, it was not found necessary to call any member to order for words spoken in debate.

No one man was the acknowledged master and leader of the convention, as might very likely have been the case had William A. Graham received his pardon, or had Mr. Badger been a delegate. The absence of Mr. Badger, who is now an inmate of the State lunatic asylum, was frequently mentioned with regret, and reference was repeatedly made to him as "that great light." But there were about fifteen men who seemed to think themselves entitled to prominence in debate and the management of business, and of these perhaps four or five were evidently persons not ill-fitted to act as leaders.

The head of the secessionists was Mr. Manly, of Craven County. The doctrines of Calhoun, he said, were not yet devoid of value and utility; they were antagonistic to the principles of centralization, so dangerous and now so much in vogue, and he was still a believer in them as he had been in 1861. Mr. Manly is tall and spare, and speaks in a low voice, as if he were feeble and easily fatigued. Almost always when he spoke his face was turned towards the floor, and his chin rested upon his chest. His eyes, too, were half closed, but now and then as he listlessly let fall a sentence he would cast a quick glance around him as if to watch the effect of his words. The chairman of the committee to report on the ordinance of secession was Mr. Nathaniel Boyden, of Rowan. He is a Massachusetts man by birth, a very well known lawyer, and once a representative in Congress. His Unionism is something more than a mere intellectual dissent from the doctrine of State sovereignty, which is a common, and perhaps the purest, form that Unionism assumes among native North Carolinians, and it is a great deal more than a mere hatred of secessionists, which is the type of Unionism that I have found most prevalent even in such counties as Randolph. In him it is a warm sentiment of loyalty and affection for his country. How it could happen that he became a member of the Legislature during the rebellion I am unable to explain. From all that I have heard of him, both here and in Salisbury, his place of residence, he must be pronounced to have been an honest and outspoken Unionist. He is a small, gray-haired gentleman, apparently not far from seventy years old, fastidiously neat in his dress. He is a tolerably good speaker. Mr. Bedford Brown, of Caswell, is also an old man, with very suave, agreeable voice and manner. He was a senator from North Carolina about twenty-five years ago, and was a prominent member of the convention of 1861. In this convention, so far as sides were taken, he occupied a middle position between the perfectly uncompromising Unionism of Mr. Boyden and the secessionism of Mr. Manly. Besides these three men, there were Mr. Pool, whom many speak of as the ablest man in the State; Mr. Warren, of Beaufort, one of Gov. Holden's provisional judges, who made the best speech that the convention has yet heard; and Mr. Moore, of Wake, whose abilities are, perhaps, fitter to shine in a committee room or a court of law than in a legislative and political assembly, but whose keenness, pugnacity, and talent for detail made him powerful in debate.

The first day of the session was spent in perfecting the organization of the convention, with reference to which there was no contest whatever, but even thus early it became evident that there were present two parties which cherished different recollections of the past, if not different purposes in the future. The delegates had come forward to the secretary's desk, and, kissing the Bible, had sworn to support the Constitution of the United States. Mr. E. G. Reade had been made permanent president of the convention without opposition, and had read a brief speech expressive of the desire of North Carolina to return to the Union: "Fellow-citizens," he said, "we are going home. Let painful reflections upon our late separation and pleasant memories of our early Union quicken our footsteps toward the old mansion, that we may grasp hard again the hand of Friendship, who stands at the door, and, sheltered by the old homestead, which was built upon a rock and has weathered the storm, enjoy together the long, bright future which awaits us." Various subordinate officers had been chosen, and then Mr. Mebane moved that a committee of seven be appointed to frame rules for the government of the convention. Mr. Manly offered an amendment to the effect that, until Mr. Mebane's committee should report, the rules prepared for the convention of 1861 be adopted as rules of order for the present convention. Mr. King at once moved as an amendment to Mr. Manly's amendment that, instead of the rules of 1861, the rules of the Constitutional Convention of 1835 be adopted. Mr. Mebane thought it quite immaterial which set of rules were selected for temporary use, but a delegate immediately informed him that, though there might be no great difference in the rules, there was a very great difference between the two years and between the action of the State at those two periods. It would be just as well to forget 1861. After this little ripple on the surface everything was quiet again, and the convention at once decided that the committee should be appointed, and that, until they reported, rules should be dispensed with.

On the second day a message was received from Governor Holden, who laid before the Convention several documents relative to the public institutions and interests of the State.

Several committees were then appointed, among others a committee on the secession ordinance of May 20, 1861, with Mr. Boyden as chairman, and a committee on the abolition of slavery.

On the third day, rather sooner than was expected, Mr. Boyden's committee reported an ordinance drawn up in these terms:

"Be it declared and ordained by the delegates of the good people of the State of North Carolina in convention assembled, and it is hereby declared and ordained, that the ordinance of the Convention of the State of North Carolina, ratified on the 21st day of November, 1789, which adopted and ratified the Constitution of the United States, is now, and at all times since the adoption and ratification thereof, hath been in full force and effect, notwithstanding the supposed ordinance of the 20th day of May, 1861, declaring that the same be repealed, rescinded, and abrogated, and the said supposed ordinance is now, and at all times hath been, null and void."

The clerk read it amid the attentive silence of the house, and immediately Mr. Smith, of Johnson County—"High Smith, of Low Johnson," as he has been called, in reference to the ignorance of his constituents and his own stature—moved that the ordinance be at once put upon its several readings. It was a rule of the convention that all resolutions and ordinances should lie over one day before coming up for consideration. Mr. Manly hoped that the rules would not be suspended nor the ordinance passed hastily. In matters of so great consequence the maturest deliberation was requisite. He objected to the phraseology of the ordinance as reported, and intended on the following day to introduce a substitute. He would, therefore, move that the motion to suspend the rules be laid on the table. As this motion, if successful, would have also carried the ordinance itself to the table, Mr. Smith withdrew his motion, and the convention soon afterwards adjourned.

On Thursday morning Governor Holden transmitted to the convention the address of the colored people of the State, with a recommendation that it be referred to a committee. The clerk read the address, which was received respectfully though not with particular attention, for it had already been published in the newspapers. Two or three members of the colored convention were in the gallery watching the fate of their address, and many significant glances were sent in that direction from the body of the house, one delegate calling the attention of another to the presence of the negroes. Mr. Caldwell, of Guilford, rose and spoke substantially as follows:

"Mr. President, I endorse the proposition of Governor Holden. I hope the time has come when the situation of these people will receive honest and careful consideration. The time has been, sir, when I have been denounced as an abolitionist—an abolitionist from the Massachusetts of North Carolina. Well, sir, I have always had my own opinions on the subject of slavery; I had them in times past and I have them now. I earnestly desire to see the condition of the negroes improved all it can be. We all know that it needs improvement, and all our best efforts will be taxed to prevent the misery and trouble that may come upon them. We can see that they've got an idea of running into the towns and trying to pick up a living by a little boot-blacking and a little white-washing. That course of life will not support them, and I am strongly in favor of wise action to prevent these evils of idleness and flocking out of the country into the towns. For my part, I want to see them sifted and scattered all over the country, not only over the South but over the North, up to the Canada line, till every Northern State, as well as we down in the South, shall be helping to bear this great black burden of humanity. Then I should go in for North Carolina's treating them as well as they can be treated everywhere, and allowing them as many privileges as Connecticut or any other Northern State."

The allusion to the Connecticut election, news of which had just reached Raleigh, was made and received with a smile. The President appointed a committee of five, with Mr. Pool at its head, to take the address into consideration, and they some days afterwards reported it inexpedient for this convention to engage itself with a question so complicated and difficult as that of the relations to be established between the blacks and the whites, and recommending that a board of three commissioners be appointed by the Governor to collect information relative to the matter and lay it before the Legislature at its next session. The report was fair and liberal in its tone, but commits the convention to nothing.

I refrain from any further attempt at a diary of the proceedings, especially since the results have doubtless already been published at the North. I may allude, however, to the warm debate which sprang up upon the question of submitting these two ordinances to the people for ratification. The Unionists were determined that slavery and secession, by name, should come before the people for final and definitive judgment. They carried their point, and the people are to vote on each ordinance separately, ratifying it or rejecting it.

In the long debate on secession, much was said in condemnation of that theory; the loss which it had inflicted on the South was bewailed, and the tyranny of the secessionists and the rebel government was denounced with bitterness. But it was roundly said that this renunciation of secessionism and its works, of itself, entitled North Carolina to her old place and power in the Union. One had to remind himself that the convention itself was an acknowledgment that the State had lost some of her rights and privileges.

The discussion of the basis of representation, the reading of the address presented by the colored convention, the report of the committee to which it had been referred, and the passage of the abolition ordinance, had all alike failed to bring up the freedmen as a topic of discussion. But an ordinance introduced by Mr. Moore, of Wake, contained, among some miscellaneous matters, a section which declared married all negroes who for six months previously to the ratification of the ordinance, and at the time of its ratification, should be living together as man and wife. Mr. Moore fought hard for his proposition, and Colonel Whittlesey, assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau in North Carolina, was in the lobby, and was understood to favor it and to desire its passage, but a large majority of the convention were opposed to taking any action whatever in relation to the condition of the negro population. It would be better to leave the whole matter to the Legislature. Mr. Dockery, of Richmond County, took occasion to state what he knew about the freed people in his part of the State, and to set forth his views of the proper policy to be pursued towards them by the national Government.

He was a friend to the negro. He could remember how he loved his old nurse, and his children now loved their negro nurse so that often they would leave the arms of their mother to go to her. But he had little confidence in the elevation of the negro race. It was true that they were in a condition of demoralization—poor, degraded, and unfortunate—and it would be well to lift them up if possible; but it could not be done by such action as Mr. Moore proposed. He felt a real attachment to the negroes—many of them—and had often told them that he did not blame them for being free. If he had been enslaved and freed by war in the same way, he himself would have cheerfully accepted his freedom, But he did blame them for their bad conduct since they were emancipated. He wanted a carefully prepared code regulating the conduct of the blacks, or they would become a disgrace and a danger to the community. But he believed that the only effective and satisfactory policy which could be adopted was that which General Jackson had pursued towards the Indians—they must be colonized. The Government owned plenty of land in the South-west, and the negroes ought to be separated from the whites and sent into that region by themselves.

When General Jackson decided to move the Indians, there was a great outcry about the inhumanity of his policy. It was cruel, they said, to tear the poor Indian from his hunting-grounds, and his springs, and the graveyards of his fathers. But General Jackson removed them, and where was the man who would to-day deny the soundness of that measure? Where was the man to say it was inhuman? Who supposed a single Indian would now be alive in Georgia or South Carolina or North Carolina if they had been left among the whites? It was just so with the negroes, and he believed it would soon be found so, and the people would decide upon colonization. Mr. Moore's ordinance had two objects in contemplation, the moral elevation of the negro by compelling him to marry the woman with whom he chose to live; and a material object—to make each negro support his own children. But the ordinance would not bring about the desired end. The negroes are determined to have as many wives as they can get. He himself had a nigger with two wives, one of whom he called his Sunday wife and the other his Monday wife; and he was rejoicing in his freedom because he could now get a third wife as soon as he could get a little more money. He had it from a gentleman of undoubted veracity that within a very short time previously there had been seventy marriages of negroes, and, of these seventy, sixty-five had within a week left other wives or husbands to take new ones. As to their working habits, the story was equally bad. He was paying his own niggers $6 a month, but they were getting dissatisfied. There was a constant stream of niggers coming along past his house, some from Raleigh, some from Greensboro' or Salisbury. Perhaps he would become aware that work had stopped in the blacksmith's shop; he would inquire the cause: "Oh, Mr. Smith's Jack or Tom has come back from Raleigh." He tells them that niggers are getting $20 a month up here, and the result is that the niggers all become discontented, and the able-bodied men wander off, leaving their wives and children on the farms. The Pedee country was a poor country anyhow, and all had to work, both white and black, or the farmers could not make buckle and tongue meet. Gentlemen might imagine what the condition of things would be with half the population wandering in idleness. It would be like an army without a leader, resolved into a mob; famine would overtake it. Colonization was the only remedy for such evils.

Mr. Little also favored a reference to a committee who should report to the next Legislature. He was a friend of the negro, but he wanted to be put on record as a believer in the doctrine that this is a white man's country and a white man's government. He was opposed to negro suffrage, negro testimony, miscegenation, and other articles of the radical faith. He was glad to see that such doctrines had been repudiated at the North, he said, and praised General J. D. Cox, formerly of Sherman's army, as a man of sound opinions. He thought there were some people who entertained unjust prejudices against the negro. He was not one, but would like to see them elevated and would not be averse to their being educated. North Carolina, unfortunately, was not able to educate her white children at present, but in time he hoped to see her educate the black.

The convention having passed an ordinance setting an early day in November for the election of members of the State Legislature, many of the delegates are anxious to return home and meet their constituents, so that it is probable that the convention will soon adjourn. But for some reason it seems to be thought best that another session should be held in the spring. Most likely no definite action will be taken upon the war debt or the condition of the freedmen until it can be known whether or not North Carolina will be admitted by Congress when she makes application, this winter, holding in her hand the ordinance abolishing slavery and that which declares that the State has never been out of the Union at all.

CENTRALIZATION IN FRANCE.

PARIS, May 6, 1865.

WHILE you are waging war against State rights, the Liberals in France are making a pacific and timid crusade against centralization. When I tell you that such men as M. Laboulaye, who has all along been the supporter of the Republican party in America, declare themselves openly in France against centralization, you will understand at once that there is no real contradiction between the ideas and theories of your Republican party and those of the French Liberals. The difference of position explains the difference of policies. With you, a movement towards centralization of power was necessary, as the Democratic party, during its long triumph, had withheld from the Executive many of the prerogatives with which the Constitution had endowed it. In France, the Executive has been rendered so tyrannical, arbitrary, and all-powerful, that a reaction is taking place against the political system which, from the days of Richelieu and Louis XIV. to those of Napoleon III., has been the means of depriving France of all the benefits of self-government.

It is hardly possible for an American, born and educated in a free community, to imagine to what extent the individuality of a French citizen is daily sacrificed to the petty exigencies of that anonymous, omnipresent, hydra-headed monster which we call "l'administration." We are born, we live, we die, with its permission; it measures to our lungs the air we breathe; it shapes the plastic molds in which the infant intellect is formed. Where will you not find a mark of its power—in what church, what school, what house, what cemetery, what office, what theatre, what hospital? Wherever and whenever two Frenchmen meet, it comes and shows itself between them. It outlives every régime, every revolution, every government. It stamps upon every head a mark which nothing can efface.

I once heard M. de Montalembert illustrate, by an amusing anecdote, the power of the French administration. Three days after the formidable insurrection of June, 1848, he found himself in a railway station, waiting in a great crowd till the officials should open the doors which lead to the platform. The heat was intense. "Could I not," said he, "open one of these glass doors to let some air in?" "No, sir; it is against the réglement." "Well," said he, "could I not break one of the windows, and pay for it?" When he uttered this proposition, the crowd moved away from him, and everybody looked almost terrified. They took him for an insurgent. The idea of breaking a window in order to evade a réglement of the administration seemed awful to these people, who three days before had witnessed a bloody and fierce insurrection, and seen Paris all covered over with barricades.

I remember another curious illustration of the power of the French centralization. A minister of public instruction, looking at his watch, said, one day: "At this moment all the boys of the French kingdom, of the same age, are translating the same Latin version, in Corsica as well as in Picardy, at Brest as well as in Strasbourg." I leave you to imagine the intense pride he felt when this vision came across his brain.

The French functionary is by essence an enemy of liberal institutions; his pride and conceit, his quiet and undisturbed tyranny, have almost reconciled me to the American theory of rotation of office. May you ever be ignorant of the genus functionary and the species bureaucrate. Your functionaries, who have such a short tenure of office, do not form a separate caste; the French functionaries, from the highest to the lowest, are protected by the famous article of the Constitution de l'an VIII., which specifies that none of them can be prosecuted before any court by any individual without the permission of the Council of State, a large committee, appointed directly by the Executive, and entirely devoted to its interests. I will take an example: The Duke d'Aumale has been working for the last twelve years at a history of the House of Condé. He has used in his work the valuable archives which he has inherited from the Condés, together with the state papers of England and of Spain. Two volumes of this important work were already printed in France, relating to the wars of religion before Henri IV., when the Préfet de Police seized the four thousand copies of the two volumes just finished at the printer's office. The Duke d'Aumale has vainly claimed his property before the common courts; the courts, one after the other, have declared that the Prefect of Police was covered by his public character. The Duke d'Aumale is therefore obliged to sue him now before the Conseil d'Etat, and it is not difficult to prophesy what the verdict of this political body will be.

The same inviolability covers the meanest officials all over France; this privilege, together with the excessive centralization, make it too easy to turn any government in France into a despotism. Had General Cavaignac been less honest, he could have secured the power to himself as well as Prince Louis Napoleon. The new French Liberal school begins to perceive that all efforts towards liberty and constitutional government will be vain if we don't reduce the privileges of the central power by diminishing those of the functionaries. A committee of Liberals, in Nancy, has just published a pamphlet against centralization which has created much sensation. It is proposed in it that in each French department the management of the affairs of the department should not be left entirely to a préfet named in Paris. The authors of the pamphlet do not go so far as to propose that the people should name the préfet in each department, as you name your governors in each State. They simply ask that the Conseils-généraux, which are named by the people in each department, and who now have only a session of eight days, and simply register, as it were, the will of the préfet, should have longer sessions, and should name a standing committee which should constantly act as a counsel to the préfet. This moderate proposition has almost convulsed our political world. A free, elected council in each department! that would be, indeed, the abomination of desolation. And what would become of our Parisian préfet, in his gilt uniform, among these provincial counsellors, if he could no more say to them, with a Louis XIV. gesture and air, "Le département, c'est moi." As every German prince copied Louis XIV. in the seventeenth century, and would have his Versailles, so every préfet now gives himself the airs of Napoleon III.; each of them has gained the Solferino battle, and saved France from anarchy. If they are no more to be the absolute rulers in each department, if the solitary will which from the Tuileries radiates through their eighty-six brains to all the parts of France has to find local obstacles in every department, there is an end of that great French unity, and we are brought back at once to the dark days of feudalism. Such is the cry of all Imperialists and pseudo-Liberals; louder than all are the friends of Prince Napoleon, the worshipper of pure Cæsarism, who, as Ampère used to say, will some day, if fortune favors him, show us Tiberius after Augustus.

The true Liberals have no difficulty in showing that French unity has nothing to fear from a better administration of local affairs; to talk of feudalism in France in 1865 is so absurd as to be simply ridiculous. What we are afraid of is not feudalism; it is this terrible alliance of demagogism and despotism which was once fatal to Rome, and may be fatal to France; this jealousy of influence, this hatred of intellect, this fear of free thought, which are at the bottom of our ruling school of imperial democracy.

This discussion about centralization, originated by the pamphlet lorrain, has had very good effects; it has drawn the line between the sham democracy, which is the servile ally of imperialism, and liberal democracy—between the hypocrites and the sincere friends of the people; it has obliged many to throw off the mask and to show what they really are. Humboldt used to say: "I prefer anarchy or a brutal despotism to an intelligent despotism; for anarchy is not a durable state, and a stupid despotism destroys itself; an intelligent despotism can deceive a nation and even the whole world for ages." It is, therefore, a happy consequence of the present discussion that our worshippers of despotism have been obliged to pronounce themselves openly against the liberal and moderate proposition of the writers of Nancy. It will no longer be so easy for them to surround their servility with a halo of liberalism; they have paid to Cæsar what they owe to Cæsar, but they have not paid to the people what they owe to the people, and the people, I hope, will remember it. A. L.

THE SERVANT QUESTION.

Mr. Ruskin, in a recent lively discussion, through the columns of a London paper, upon the annoyances from servants, has informed the public that there are but two alternatives to adopt if they would settle the matter—"slavery or adoption." The ordinary "commercial relation" he regards a failure. America has tried all three modes of settling the problem. The South has had "domestic and patriarchal service," with what result must be apparent even to Mr. Ruskin. The West has tried (to a degree) a kind of "sonship" or adoption—the bringing up a servant in the family—with immense advantage to the servant, though not always an equal comfort to the family. But this primitive arrangement, which is undoubtedly as Mr. Ruskin says, the best for society, must gradually yield to the more complicated demands of increasing comfort, and there, as in the whole country, the "commercial relation" take the principal place. There will be a kind of malignant satisfaction to our housekeepers in finding that prosperity is bringing to England something of the nameless troubles with "domestic service" which have so long been our affliction here. The effect of emigration, low tariffs, skilful finance, and unceasing industry, has been at length to raise the laboring class of England, so that their rate of wages has vastly increased. Wages in London are equal to those of New York. Servant-girls wear "silk mantillas" and "dress-bonnets," flowers and flounces, become extravagant and restless, and continually marry out of their class into the next class above them, and the respectable level of the good old English class of house-servants is greatly disturbed. The immense and sudden increase of wealth, also, the last few years has created a class of nouveaux riches, of "shoddy" mistresses, in Great Britain, such as we have here who do not know how to manage their servants, and thus "spoil" them, so that English society is as full of that novel topic, the trials of servants, as American.

This is especially the time of year in this country in which the plagues of domestic service descend upon our households. In the autumn the servant girl, who has already changed her place three or four times in the course of the year, conceives a new desire for society or change of scene, and at once departs, leaving the household in confusion. All that large class of families who live near cities, and who have experienced a problematical domestic calm up to this season, now find their sanguine hopes prostrated by a sudden exodus of their "help" to the town—these people, like their betters, enjoying rural scenery in the summer months and then preferring the social life and excitements of the cities in the winter. This flitting is prematurely hastened if sickness has attacked a family, or its members are to be increased, as the profession understand that these trying or interesting occasions by no means lighten their labors. Then come to the master or mistress the agonies of the "intelligence" or "non-intelligence" office: the ordeal of fifty severe-looking "girls" of all ages, the cross-examination by the "help," the proud disdain with which a place is rejected if the chambermaid does not help the cook, or company cannot be seen every night, or the master wants breakfast for an early train. Finally, after endless worry, a promising person is secured by great humiliation; she is engaged to be on the boat or train; the employer proceeds trustingly to his home, and the promised hour comes and passes and no servant appears, and the family is again left cookless or waiterless. At length some emigrant is secured, more innocent in the ways of the New World, but with a tendency to mingle the habits of an Irish bothie with those of an American kitchen, and she has to go through with a long course of instruction, the devoted mistress spending a large part of her time in the kitchen. As soon as she is fairly trained and is really useful, she has become initiated in the ways of the class, and, hearing of a better situation, coolly gives notice and leaves, or decamps without notice. The experience of the cities is perhaps not quite so afflicting, but nearly so—of "girls with airs;" girls who make fearful blunders in the midst of trying dinner-parties; girls who entertain a brilliant circle of friends in their kitchens, at the mistress's expense; girls who are dishonest and get drunk, and of all the change and discomfort which their riotous habits bring. The "commercial relation" does not seem always to reach them, as they will, not infrequently, with the heedlessness of the class, leave on a mere freak higher wages for lower. Nor do the miscalled "intelligence offices" afford the least remedy; they are none of them to be trusted. No one ever looks closely into the character of a servant recommended, or is responsible for her failure, or corrects one of the abuses of the whole system. They are in fact mainly supported by the servants.

The great consolation to the mistress is rather a general and philanthropic than a personal one. Each lady must remember that for a considerable portion of her life she is at the head of a "Philanthropic Servants-Training School," where one rough and ignorant peasant woman after another is taught cleanliness, order, good taste, and good cooking, and is fitted to be the wife of some laborer, or policeman, or mechanic, or upper-servant by-and-bye. Thousands of nice laboring-men's homes over the country are the fruits of the long and apparently useless torments of our mistresses. Our very evils also come from our blessings. It is our prosperity that makes the serving-class restless. It is the remuneration and profit of labor which render the "domestics" ambitious and extravagant. They are continually bettering or hoping to better their condition. There is little of such trouble with servants in Italy, still less in China. In England the annoyances begin as the people improve in condition. We must philosophically take our troubles with our blessings.

Then another thing should be considered at the present time: servants' wages have by no means risen in proportion to the rise of all other values. They cost less, on the whole, than they do in England. A house-servant (say chambermaid) can be got in New York for $9 a month, or $108 per annum, and her "keep" will be say $150, making her total cost $258. In London, in a middle-class family, wages would be £16 per annum, say $162, and keep, including beer, £22 or $224, making the total cost $386. Yet here, owing to the tariff, all the personal expenses to the woman, for shoes, calicoes, silk mantillas, and dresses, are more than doubled since 1860, and heavier than similar outlays would be in England. Low wages will inevitably bring poor labor. Furthermore, it must be remembered that the annoyances are by no means on the side of the servants alone. The mistresses are not all perfect. Some are freaky, uncertain, and moody; others are exacting and imperious, fancying that a human being can work for them the year round and never want a human enjoyment, or the least variety; others are careless and indulgent. Some, the moment a girl is sick or disabled, cast her aside; others "nag" their servants too much, or get into a passion with them, instead of correcting them occasionally and carefully. Then, again, the relation itself is an unnatural and difficult one. It needs a somewhat irregular, dependent, and unambitious person to be willing to sacrifice all privacy, independence, and chances of rising in the world, and labor on in the hap-hazard way which American households require. A servant in America is usually an inferior sort of person, morally considered, when compared, for instance, with the class keeping their own homes. The work is not hard, but it is exacting and entirely invades privacy, and is ill paid. For ourselves, we never wonder that American young women have such a horror of domestic service.

Considering the inherent difficulties of the relation and the economical causes of our troubles, we confess we see no cure for our annoyances, in the United States, in this matter. It is a relation which almost necessarily forbids all sentiment; there can be no patriarchal character to it, and seldom even common personal attachment. What is wanted is, first, great consideration by the mistresses for the servants; then exactitude and thorough justice, and, if possible, liberal payment. The commercial basis is the basis for it. Ladies with large establishments and without children will, of course, have fewer of these troubles, as servants will all prefer such places, and will remain longer in them.

All might avoid many of the difficulties now experienced by being more exact in demanding "characters," and by encouraging some better kind of intelligence offices. A new office has been established in London, which is supported solely by the mistresses, charging a higher price but being more particular in the kind of servants they recommend. Such an agency here would be a great improvement.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMPLETE WORKS.

NEW AND ELEGANT EDITION.

EDITED BY RICHARD GRANT WHITE.

In Twelve Volumes crown 8vo, $36 00; 16mo edition, $24 00.

The chief characteristics of this edition are as follows:

I. Adhesion to the text of the authentic folio of 1623, excepting where that is manifestly corrupt or defective.

II. The restoration of many passages from the original text, which the editor shows to have been carelessly assumed to be corrupt in preceding modern editions.

III. The successful emendation of many passages which are undeniably corrupt, and which have baffled the efforts of previous editors and commentators.

IV. The discovery and correction of many corruptions of the text, which have hitherto been undetected.

V. The "frugal selection from the labors of all" the commentators, which Steevens desired, and which he believed would one day be made. This selection frequently takes the form of condensation; and it is with the extremest rarity made the occasion of controversy.

VI. The adaptation of the Notes—whether textual, explanatory, or antiquarian—to the capacity, not of professed men of letters on the one hand, or of dull and uneducated persons on the other; but of the great mass of Shakespeare's intelligent readers.

VII. The careful preservation of the rhythm of Shakespeare's prose as well as verse, according to the contractions in use at his time, or peculiar to him, as they are given in the old editions, though almost universally neglected in those of modern date.

VIII. The examination, and, as far as possible, the determination, of the old modes of pronunciation, which in numberless instances affect the rhythm, and in many the sense of the text.

IX. Remarks upon the state of our language in the time of Shakespeare, which are interspersed through the Notes.

X. The crediting of every emendation, explanation, or illustrative quotation to the editor or commentator who first brought it forward—thus succinctly giving the reader the history of every disputed passage, and so of the vicissitudes of the text.

XI. The separation of the text and the notes. As every lover of Shakespeare desires, sometimes, at least, to read his text "simple, of itself," without the distraction inevitable when notes and references are forced upon the eye, the text of this edition is not cumbered and deformed by notes, or references to notes, upon the page; but the notes are placed at the end of each play, with clear marginal references to act, scene, and page; so that whoever seeks elucidation or justification of a reading may find it instantly, but not have it thrust upon him, whether he will or not.

XII. This edition is accompanied by a reduced fac-simile of the curious and interesting preliminary matter to the folio of 1623; by two portraits, one of which has never been published in this country; and by views in Stratford-on-Avon, some of which have been taken specially to illustrate the Memoir of the Poet—which, with an Essay upon his Genius, a compact but comprehensive History of the Text, and an account of the Rise and Progress of the English Drama, appear in the first volume.

AGENTS WANTED

FOR

BY ALBERT D RICHARDSON,

N. Y. Tribune Correspondent.

1,000 COPIES SELLING PER DAY!

The most interesting and exciting book ever published, embracing Mr. Richardson's unparalleled experience for four years. Travelling through the South in the secret service of The Tribune at the outbreak of the war, with our armies and fleets, both East and West, during the first two years of the Rebellion; his thrilling capture; his confinement for twenty months in seven different Rebel prisons; his escape, and almost miraculous journey by night of nearly 400 miles. It abounds in stirring events, and contains more of the fact, incident, and romance of the war than any other work yet published. Horace Greeley says of it:

"A great many books will yet be written concerning this war, in addition to the many already in print; but not one of them will give, within a similar compass, a clearer, fuller, more readable account, entirely from personal observation, of the nature, animus, purposes, tendencies, and instrumentalities of the Slaveholders' Rebellion, than does the unpretending narrative of Mr. Richardson."

Teachers, ladies, energetic young men, and especially returned and disabled officers and soldiers, in want of profitable employment, will find it particularly adapted to their condition. Send for Circulars. Address

Here is collected and tersely set down a vast quantity of various and useful knowledge, such as is indispensable to educated men and women. Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

PERSONS interested in Biblical studies will be glad to hear from a well-informed source—Mr John Murray, the publisher—that "the commentary on the Bible, suggested by the Speaker (!) and inaugurated by the Archbishop of York and other bishops and divines, far from being abandoned, is making steady progress, some portions of the work being already in type—the scholars and divines engaged upon it having felt that a speedy publication was quite subordinate to the proper and thorough execution of so momentous a design." The motives that have led to this undertaking are undoubtedly laudable, and the results will be welcome to students of all orthodox denominations. Any attempt, however, to give it an official or authoritative value will be a great mistake, as the time when the largest individual liberty of opinion has been by legal decisions declared the characteristic of the Church of England would be very inappropriate for an attempt to tie it down to any system or theory, however good, of scriptural interpretation. The effort to do this would provoke resistance and the unseemly marshalling of Bishop against Bishop, and D.D. against D.D., the very thing which the Church has always most judiciously avoided. The commentary thus "patronized by the Speaker of the House of Commons" will have just the degree of authority claimed by its merit, and no more.

—Critics are already disputing about the text of Thackeray's famous ballad, "The Three Sailors," and grave correspondents are writing to "Notes and Queries" to know if the air to which he was accustomed to chant it, among friends, when certain small hours of the night had arrived, is preserved. As a curiosity we give it from his own uniquely beautiful MS., with the accompanying note. Mr. Bevan, to whom it was addressed, had written it down from memory when sung by the author at a students' supper at Rome, to print in a volume of travelling sketches called "Sand and Canvass." Thackeray was not satisfied with the viva voce copy, so sent the following:

THE THREE SAILORS.

There were three sailors in Bristol City,
Who took a boat and went to sea.

But first with beef and Captain's biscuit,
And pickled pork they loaded she.

There was guzzling Jack, and gorging Jimmy,
And the youngest he was little Billy.

Now very soon, they were so greedy,
They did n't leave not one split pea.

Says guzzling Jack to gorging Jimmy,
"I am confounded hung-ery."

Says gorging Jim to guzzling Jacky,
"We have no wittles, so we must eat we."

Says guzzling Jack to gorging Jimmy,
"O gorging Jim, what a fool you be—

There 's little Bill, as is young and tender,
We 're old and tough, so let 's eat he.

O Bill we 're going to kill and eat you,
So undo the collar of your chemee."

When Bill he heard this information,
He used his pocket handkerchee.

"O let me say my catechism,
As my poor mammy taught to me."

"Make haste, make haste," says guzzling Jacky,
Whilst Jim pulled out his snickersnee.

So Bill went up the main-top-gallant-mast,
Where down he fell on his bended knee.

He scarce had said his catechism,
When up he jumps, "There 's land I see:

There 's Jerusalem and Madagascar,
And North and South Amerikey,

There 's the British fleet a-riding at anchor,
With Admiral Napier, K.C.B."

So when they came to the Admiral's vessel,
He hanged first Jack and flogged Jimmy,

But as for little Bill, he made him
The captain of a seventy-three.

"DEAR BEVAN:
I do n't like the looks of the ballad at all in print, but, if you please, prefer to have it in this way, exactly. "Be blowed," it would never do in a printed ballad of Yours very truly, WM. M. THACKERAY."

—One of the most interesting announcements of the season has just been made by Messrs. Moxon & Co. It is that they are preparing for the press "A Life of Charles Lamb," by Mr. Proctor, better known as the poet Barry Cornwall. No particulars are yet given, but we may be sure that if Mr. Proctor's book goes over again the whole field of a life so lovingly treated by Talfourd, it is because the access of new matter and the freedom of discussion made attainable by lapse of time amply authorize him in so doing. The papers of the same date give an extract from a letter to The Guardian, written to call attention to the neglected state of the grave of "Elia" and his sister, in Edmonton church-yard. The author describes it as overshadowed by the solidly-built stone monument of "Gideon Rippon, of the Bank of England," trodden down, and partly covered with nettles. It is an unquestionable fact, and we note it simply as a fact, that the popular appreciation of Charles Lamb has a far stronger and deeper root in this country than in Eng'and. It is Americans who print the handsomest editions of Charles Lamb's works—who make pilgrimages to the old East India House, the scene of his official labors—who collect most eagerly any relics of Lamb, and who will be, we doubt not, the chief subscribers to the monument it is now sought to erect on his uncared-for grave. Mr. Babson's careful though incomplete "Eliana," or collection of Lamb's unacknowledged writings, is an undertaking that would hardly have been executed in England. Recently, in London, at the sale of the library of Mr. John Taylor, the proprietor of the "London Magazine," were sold the original MSS. of several of the essays of Elia, which originally appeared in that periodical. The inimitable "Roast Pig" brought £10, or fifty dollars. We believe that ten times this amount would readily be given by many of Lamb's admirers here. The scanty remains of Lamb's library that were brought to this country, whenever they change possessors, do so at a vastly increasing rate. It is worthy of notice, as characteristic of the two men, that while Coleridge could not read a book without his active mind overflowing in comments on the fly-leaves and margins, not a trace of an original note could be found in any of Charles Lamb's volumes. He was careful and painstaking in making them perfect by transcription and adding illustrative matter from other sources, but he seems to have respected his "ragged regiment" too much to make them the vehicle of his own thoughts. When any further collection of Lamb's writings is intended, application should be made to the autograph-hunters in America, as the disease rages strong among us, and many unpublished letters of Lamb are to be found in their portfolios. We remember one, very suggestive of the writer, describing an enforced stay at a quiet country town, in Mr. G. P. Putnam's collection, but are unable to trace it to its present owner.

—A new edition of "Pre-historic Man," by Professor D. Wilson, of Toronto University, has just been brought out by Messrs. Macmillan & Co. As compared with other works on the subject, Professor Wilson's book is distinguished by the careful and extensive view taken of American ethnological researches, in which they are for the first time treated in connection with similar investigations in other parts of the world. Prof. Wilson's position in Canada has afforded him the means of effecting this, and his work has first introduced to general notice abroad the results now daily developing in aboriginal history and antiquities.

—The contemplated retirement of Mr. Antonio Panizzi from the chief librarianship of the British Museum will probably cause the revival of the much disputed point—the expediency of a printed catalogue of that national collection of books. Of such a catalogue most literary men of the day have expressed their favorable opinion and anxious desire to see it completed, particularly Thomas Carlyle, J. P. Collier, Sir H. Nicolas, Rev. A. Dyce, and others known as students and persons of learned research. Nevertheless, the single influence of Mr. Panizzi has been able to neutralize the opposition, and after printing one volume, containing the letter A, twenty-five years ago, he stopped the work, and it has never been resumed. The advantages that the circulation of a complete catalogue offers in making accessible the books it describes, and bringing the fact of their existence and local distribution to the knowledge of those who need them, are so obvious that no one but an idiot could dispute them; it is not, therefore, on the ground of principle, but rather on the difficulty of realizing an ideal except by the sacrifice of other desirable ends, that Mr. Panizzi's objections were based. The British Museum Library has, under his management, been increasing at an average rate of thirty thousand volumes per annum, until it has now reached nearly, if not quite, the number of seven hundred thousand volumes. By no plan of printing that might be adopted could the description of so vast a collection be finished in less than several years, starting from a given point, and in the meantime the "logic of facts" would have destroyed the completeness that was to form its chief value, added to which the immense cost involved in such an undertaking—with little prospect of return from any expected sale for the catalogue—might better be spent in increasing the library itself. The practical difficulties connected with the matter of catalogue printing on a very enlarged scale are so great that they appear to have foiled even the imperial will. A few years since, Louis Napoleon gave orders for the publication of the catalogue of the French Imperial Library. Two separate divisions were hastily commenced—"History of France" and "Medicine." Seven or eight quarto volumes of the first have appeared, and one of the latter. It is now said that the undertaking is suspended indefinitely, and will only extend to the completion of these divisions. In this country we have scarcely a good book catalogue of any kind, a vicious desire for brevity making them mere unsatisfactory indexes to the collections that they should illustrate and describe. We have a good testimony as to what a catalogue should be from that great and thoroughly practical man, Franklin, in one that he printed in 1764 of the books of the Library Company of Philadelphia, the institution whose foundation and progress is so fully detailed in his autobiography, and which never ceased to claim his interest and care. Various indications scattered throughout the volume show it to be of his own drawing up, and, in striking contrast to the present meagre fashion of curtailing the description of a book to a single line, every word on the title-page is given, so that in the fashion of the last century it often amounts to a synopsis of the work, and makes the catalogue itself a volume at once instructive and pleasant to turn over. No one need disdain to learn of Franklin, and we hope in this respect he will yet find imitators.

—The beautiful edition of the Chinese Classics undertaken by Dr. James Legge, of the London Missionary Society, through means furnished by private munificence, has reached its second volume. The first was devoted to the works of Confucius, the second introduces us to the writings of Mencius, a sage who, in the opinion of his nation, stands only second to his great master. Mencius was born B.C. 371 and lived to the age of 84, so that his period synchronizes with the era of Plato, Aristotle, Epicurus, and other great names of the West. In the words of his editor and translator: "When we place Mencius among his contemporaries he can look them in the face. He does not need to hide a diminished head." His doctrine of human nature was as nearly as possible, we are told, that of Bishop Butler. "The will (he said) is the leader of the passion nature. The passion nature pervades and animates the body. The will is first and chief, and the passion nature is subordinate to it. Man is formed only for virtue. There is in man a natural principle of benevolence, a natural principle of righteousness, a natural principle of propriety, and a natural principle of apprehending moral truth." The series of "Chinese Classics" is expected to form seven volumes. They are printed at Hong Kong, in large octavo, and include the original texts, with a translation, critical and exegetical notes, prolegomena by the editor, and copious indexes. They are sold in London at the not unreasonable price of £2 2s. per volume, or about twenty dollars in currency at present rates. The third volume will include the most ancient historical records of China, and is now in preparation.

—Like many other men of genius, the technical powers of the inspired artist William Blake were scarcely adequate to the proper rendering of his own ideas. No series of his illustrations has ever appeared with the same advantages that his beautiful designs to "Blair's Grave" derive from the masterly burin of Schiavonetti, confessedly the first engraver of the day. They form an epitome of the unseen world, and for nobleness of expression, purity of line, and severely grand yet picturesque composition, they stand unequalled. We can only wonder that a generation saturated with the extravagances of Fuseli and the inanities of Westall as book illustrators, could pass them by without recognition of their surpassing excellence. The publication of Mr. Gilchrist's illustrated "Life and Works of Blake" has created quite a furore in the artistic world for the possession of his designs, and they have lately advanced in value almost fifty-fold. To the enterprise of Mr. J. W. Bouton, one of our best informed purveyors of European books, of 481 Broadway, American collectors are indebted for a limited opportunity to procure one of Blake's finest works, the "Illustrations to the Grave," already referred to. Mr. Bouton has just returned from a periodical "raid" or "foray" to Europe, not undertaken in the interest of devastation, although he returns as richly laden with the spoils of time as any practical free-trader of Sherman's army. During his visit to England Mr. Bouton was so fortunate as to secure the entire remaining copies of Blake's "Blair's Grave," comprising fine impressions of twelve illustrations, and the masterly portrait of Blake, by Phillips, which made him a Royal Academician. They consist only of sixty-seven copies in imperial quarto, and four on large paper in folio. Subscribers' names are taken at the very moderate price of fifteen dollars per copy, and thirty dollars for the few in folio. They are to be delivered in November in the order of the names as received. Mr. Bouton's room will be found an attractive place of resort for lovers of art, his spécialité as a dealer lying largely among the splendid European illustrated books, galleries, etc., so rarely met with at our stores.

—We are always instructed in the superiority of the world of mind over that of matter, and partly realize it in our lives, but it appears as if the two must be brought in contact to reach their highest expression. The noblest triumphs of intellect seem to be those won by the investigation of physical and material causes and effects. They strike the mind with a force and grandeur that mere metaphysical speculation could never attain. Prof. Phillips's address to the British Association supplies some noteworthy instances of these most remarkable inferential results from observed phenomena. There are few if any minds who have not been impressed with the nebular hypothesis of Herschel and La Place, according to which we not only saw "worlds on worlds in phalanx bright" in the heavens, but were actually admitted to the secrets of nature's laboratory, and could trace matter from its original diffusion to its condensation in the nebulous bodies of the sidereal world ("nursery mothers of the stars") and its progress towards more perfect formation. The great telescope of Lord Rosse was supposed to have demolished the theory, as it resolved most of the nebulæ to which it could be applied into collections of separate stars, rendered indistinct to ordinary telescopic vision by remoteness of distance. So the question remained till a new means of investigation presented itself by Prof. Kirchoff's discovery of spectrum analysis. By this means the very constitution of the heavenly bodies can be ascertained. Tested thus, the nebulæ are found in some instances to have stellar points, but they are not stars. Their composition is shown to be entirely different; they resemble enormous masses of luminous gas, composed of three materials, nitrogen, hydrogen, and a substance at present unknown. Stars tested in the same manner are shown to be constituted like our own sun, and, like it, they exhibit the presence of many terrestial elements, as sodium, magnesium, iron, and hydrogen. The moon and Venus show no signs of an atmosphere, but Jupiter and Saturn have one like that of the earth, with the addition of some unknown body, probably a gas or vapor peculiar to those spheres. No one can grasp the train of facts here most imperfectly alluded to without feeling how much the world of thought gains by these daring excursions beyond "the flaming bounds of space and time" of the poet, whose wildest imaginings scarcely reach to the sober certainties of the philosophers.

—It is always pleasant to meet with fresh notices of any of the members of Dr. Johnson's circle of acquaintance, but by this time all matter of the kind has been so often worked over by memoir and magazine writers that few and scanty additions to our stock of information now appear. We are indebted to Mrs. Farrar's agreeable "Recollections of Seventy Years," just published by Ticknor & Fields, for a closer acquaintance with one of the friends of her youth, Mrs. Knowles, the Quaker lady, whom all readers of "Boswell" will recall as meeting the doctor several times at Mr. Dilly's, and on one occasion engaging in an animated discussion with him on the subject of the conversion to Quakerism of a young lady, in which Johnson's temper certainly got the better of his reason as well as his politeness. "The fair Quaker" (as Boswell calls her) resembled, in many points, the strong-minded women of our own day; she was a good classical scholar, eminent for her attractive conversation, and her boldness in supporting her opinions by argument against the fiat of the great social dictator actually made her notorious among both his admirers and enemies. She was famous, also, for working pictures and taking portraits in worsted, her "sutile pictures," as Johnson called them, obtaining so much reputation that she had the honor of a commission for a likeness of himself from the King, George III. When Mrs. Farrar, as a girl, knew her, Mrs. Knowles, who had been left a handsome fortune by her husband, a physician, was injuring all her talents and good qualities by an insane devotion to money that in time shut her out from all society and reduced the fair Quaker of former times to the condition of a miserly old hag, unwilling to supply herself with the decencies of life. Mrs. Farrar's reminiscences include the names of many other characters that it is difficult to imagine in actual contact with one yet among us, as Mrs. Barbauld, Mrs. Opie, Sir William and Lady Hamilton, Lord Nelson, and others who to ordinary experience have "gone far off and become historical." They are narrated in a style of simplicity that inspires confidence in their revelations.

GRIMM'S MICHAEL ANGELO.*

EVERY buyer of this, the Boston edition, should borrow a copy of the second London edition (Smith, Elder & Co., 1865) and copy therefrom two important adjuncts, which the American publishers have despised. The "Translator's Preface" in the first volume, though it contains interesting matter, is really not essential to the right use of the book—but then it is short, and would take not more than half an hour to transcribe in a legible hand. That which we would have copied from the second volume would be much more tedious and troublesome to write out, but then it is quite essential to the right use of the book; we mean the index. It is almost incredible that a leading publishing house should, at this day, have published an historical work of supposed permanent value without an index. Had there been none in existence, it would almost have been the duty of a house of the standing of Little, Brown & Co. to cause one to be prepared for their own edition. The fact that none was attached to the first English edition only made more evident the necessity of having one; and the second London edition, with the index, was received here so long before the appearance of the Boston one, that the latter was generally thought to be a reprint of it. In other respects the one closely imitates the other, and the two are published at the remunerative prices of a guinea and five dollars, respectively.

The lady whose name appears on the title-page is known as a translator. Her work seems to have been done easily; too easily, indeed. To translate a somewhat philosophical history from the German into English is no easy task for any one woman; and men, too, who have tried to turn German or French standard works into English have found—or, at least, have proved to their readers' satisfaction—that it is one thing to be able to read the original with enjoyment, and quite another to be able to turn it into good, idiomatic, elegant English. We have not succeeded in finding, in New York, a copy of the German original of the "Life of Michael Angelo," but the English text conveys the idea of a conscientious attempt to give the sense of what the author wrote. Yet it is safe to assume that Mr. Grimm wrote good German, and good German is not fitly represented by inelegant English. Moreover, errors in translation occur which go far to prove the truth of a dictum which has been much disputed, that a translator must know as much of the matter in hand as the author. There is another fruitful source of errors, inseparable from the plan of this book as we have it: the author writes in German of Italian men and things, art and literature, and the translator puts the author's thoughts into English. There is thus at least a two-fold chance of errors in the use of language, and, without unusual care on the part of the translator in verifying and in comparison with Italian originals, there will be multifold risk of errors of all sorts. Now it is probable, for reasons which we shall mention hereafter, that many of the inaccuracies, inelegancies, misstatements, errors of fact, and absurdities, which disfigure this book, are to be traced to the author. But, in the absence of his original text, it will be safer to make no attempt to fix responsibility. On page 20 of the first volume we find:

"At the period in which he (Giotto) worked, the intellectual centre of Europe was not in Italy. . . . . It was from France that the new Gothic style came into Italy. It was in France also that Giotto painted. His tender figures . . . . still carry with them too much of miniature painting for us entirely to deny the school in which their master learned to draw."

Is it meant that Giotto learned to draw in France? The words, "It was in France," etc., seem to convey that meaning; but the last sentence, if it means anything, means that he learned to draw in Italy, and that, therefore, his figures "carry with them too much of miniature painting." Let us look at the fact: Giotto was in France and painted there, principally at Avignon, whither he accompanied Pope Clement when the seat of the Papacy was removed from Rome. But before he went thither he had painted, of works that still remain, the frescoes in Santa Croce at Florence the decorations of the upper and lower churches at Assissi, including the series of pictures illustrating the life of St. Francis; the frescoes in the Campo Santo at Pisa, illustrating the life of Job; and the portrait of Dante in the Barghello at Florence; besides all these, the "O" had been drawn, and Giotto had been in Rome and had painted a whole era of pictures in the Basilica of St. Peter and in the Vatican. It is absurd, therefore, to use Giotto to prove that "the intellectual centre of Europe was not in Italy." That it had not been is true; that Gothic architecture came from France is true; that Giotto learned something new about architecture while in France is possible—and the campanile was designed after his return—but he and Dante were precisely the men who did most to make Italy the intellectual centre which she long afterwards continued to be. Four lines further on we are told that Giotto was "not devoid of individual power." On page 22 the campanile of Santa Maria del Fiore is called a "column," said to be "quadrangular" (it is square, the term used is of course inaccurate), and to be "inlaid" with marble (it is in great part built of marble, and entirely sheathed with it). On the next page the bell-tower is still further misused: we are told that the outside is "formed of slates of black and white marble" (perhaps the translator wrote "slabs"), and that it is "covered with the most beautiful ornaments and sculpture, which are continued in marvellous abundance to the very top" (two-thirds of the height is entirely without sculpture, except simple crockets and capitals; the campanile is a typical example of sculpture used to the best advantage, and put where it can be seen). Out of the discussion of the tower all we can extract is, that there is a great lack of accurate knowledge concerning it between the author and translator. Turning to the middle of the first volume, and opening at random, we find on page 265 a number of pencil-marks denoting blunders. The Pope "ordered him to discover the best place for the monument in the Basilica of St. Peter." Angelo's Pietà stands in the chapel "dedicated to the holy Petronella;" where Saint Petronella would be the proper English rendering of the idea. This is a clear case of mistranslation. Die heilige is merely "saint" (feminine) when used with a proper name. Five lines below we find that the Basilica had been "more than once defended by force and conquered," a clause wholly enigmatical, leaving it to the reader to study the history of the Basilica of St. Peter and ascertain whether it was taken or successfully defended. In the next line, "tribute of the lands was received" means anything or nothing; the author probably wrote something equivalent to "tribute of the nations." So far page 265 makes a bad show for the translator, but the next line seems to bring the author into court: "Two long rows of antique pillars supported the framework of the roof." The Basilica of St. Peter was five-aisled and had four rows of pillars, and from these sprang arches which supported lofty walls covered with paintings and mosaics, and on the walls, nearly a hundred feet above the columns, rested the framework of the roof or roofs. A few lines further on we have "corridors" when cloisters is meant, or perhaps arcades. This is the translator's fault, but the blunder in the next line is harder to fix: "the immense bronze pine apple" should be pine cone, that is, seed-vessel or fruit of the pine-tree, and whether author or translator is guilty of this we have no means of deciding. But it is more likely to be the author, as we judge from what follows about "the water gushing down between the leaves." And the author certainly is responsible for the assertion in the next line that the church front had six doors; it had five.

The exposure of these countless blunders of this sort is perhaps not a profitable task, but it may be well to try a page of the second volume. We find on page 317 this awkward sentence: "It is probable that Michael Angelo, as he was influenced by Vittoria to cultivate poetry at all again, received from her also the impetus to those views." And the half-page that follows is full of inaccuracies and inelegancies of language: "Resignation for the present;" "longing for her husband suggested to her her first verses;" "complete abstraction at length in religious feelings;" "nothing was more different, however, than Michael Angelo's poems and her own;" "reflecting them in images which did not penetrate deeply;" all these are in less than a page. On page 154 there is a delicious bit: "He had him execute, so Condivi says, an infant St. John and a St. Giovannino." Of course Condivi says no such thing, but Angelo did "execute" an infant St. John or St. Giovannino, for Lorenzo dei Medici. On page 57 the meaning of Leonardo's advice to his pupils is ludicrously misunderstood. On page 86 the Loggia dei Lanzi is called a public hall.

The historical and descriptive portion of the book is very inaccurate. On the one hand there are pages and paragraphs where there are signs of study and thought, and on the other there is a great deal of the most hasty generalization and crude speculation. Much of the discussion concerning artists and their works, where description and criticism are mingled and a philosophical conclusion is drawn, is weak because based on false premises. The judgments expressed of the early men and their works, Brunelleschi, Verrochio, Donatello, Ghiberti, Giotto, are oftener wrong than right. Throughout the book there is a tendency to begin with a theory and warp facts to establish it. The curiously false conclusions to which this sort of reasoning is apt to bring one—especially in matters relating to the fine arts—are seen in every chapter of the book. To quote them in full would require more space than we can spare, but there is an instance on page 142 of the first volume less evident than some: "The bas-reliefs surrounding it exhibit a certain rude magnificence and are superior to anything produced by painting at that time. For, while the latter was compelled to keep to the forms of the living Byzantine masters, sculpture imitated the few remains of the ancient artists, and in so doing flourished. So widely divided were the sources from which the two arts drew new life." It would require an essay to discuss the fallacies contained in those three sentences. Angelo's own mind and power are better understood, and his separate works better described and criticized, than the minds and the works of other artists, but the labored comparison between Angelo and Raphael is one of the most mistaken pieces of thought in the book. A few words here and there about Luini seem to indicate an entire ignorance of anything but the name of that great painter. The account of the Venetian power and national character, though slight, is one of the best passages; but the discussion of the Venetian art is conducted according to the popular (and essentially German) notion of the nature of that art, and is, of course, inconclusive and false in the main. The guide-book raptures over Rome and Venice, and the cheap learning in the opening comparison between Florence and Athens, are matched by the sophomoric antithesis at the beginning of the second chapter, and the evident uncertainty of the author, shown in many parts of the book, whether he ought to regret or to rejoice over the substitution of revived classic for Gothic forms of building. Against the whole of the extravagant laudation of Cornelius, with which the book abounds, and which is the principal purpose of the closing chapter, we warn those who are not familiar with the work of that painter: he is, indeed, as Mr. Grimm often says, a better painter than Kaulbach, but is not, on that account or any other account, great or eminent.

This work is not, of course, without merit. We have alluded to the account of Venice at the beginning of the second volume. The account of the roof paintings of the Sistine Chapel and that of the Medicean tombs in the sacristy of San Lorenzo have a certain value, though there seems no ground for the theory advanced, that the usual ascription of the tombs of Lorenzo and Giuliano dei Medici should be reversed. The account of Condivi and Vasari in the first volume seems to be just. And the author is familiar with many of the conclusions of modern thinkers on art, and is often right in his use of them. But we dwell so briefly upon these merits, and have discusssd the faults so much more at length, because we hold that there has been no good reason for writing the book.

The ostensible reason for writing it is as follows: A number of papers, long preserved in the archives of the Buonarotti family, in Florence, have come into the possession of the British Museum. Among them are many letters from Michael Angelo himself, and much valuable information in regard to dates and events is to be found in them. The Italian text of some of these is given in the appendices to these two volumes, and these appendices are precisely what make the book worth buying. The proper course for Mr. Grimm to have adopted was to have published for his countrymen the Italian text of these letters, with an accurate translation in German, and, perhaps, a thread of narrative to connect them. By these means he would have helped the world toward a right understanding of the times and men of which this book affords but a confused image.

There already exists a much better life of Michael Angelo than this, written by Mr. John S. Harford, the second edition of which was published in 1858. It is calm and scholarly in tone, affording a marked contrast to the hurried and crowded text of Bunnètt's Grimm, and is historically very valuable, giving needed and authentic information on many points which Mr. Grimm touches but to confuse. In the matter of art criticism it is deficient, but not misleading or injurious.

No new life of Angelo is needed, unless it be an elaborate review of his art and the art of his time. Mr. Grimm seems to have but a traveller's knowledge of his or of any art. If some one, well versed in mediæval history, and an excellent Italian scholar, will devote three or four years of his life to a careful, patient study of Italian art from the twelfth century down to the death of Angelo, and will then write a book about half as full and discursive as this is, and of such size as will hold his principal subject clearly stated and completely reasoned out, he will be a public benefactor. Mr. Grimm's course has been nearly the exact opposite to this, and his work is consequently of but little value.

POETRY OF THE ORIENT.*

How shall the West be brought duly to appreciate and respect the East? is, to the true lover of his kind, one of the pressing questions of the day. In the strength of our superior civilization, and the arrogance prompted by our consciousness of its possession, we are in danger of doing less than justice to that larger portion of mankind whom we group together under the name "Orientals." We know, and are ready to acknowledge, in a general way, that science, religion, and polity had their beginnings in Asia. But we have no personal feeling of indebtedness on that account to the Asiatic populations of our own time. Ex oriente lux is a true enough motto for the historian and archæologist; but, with the sun riding high in heaven above our heads, what care we for the low Eastern hills which were reddened by his first beams, but now rest in the dimness of a gathering twilight? Who loves the Chinese any better, because so many important elements of our culture came from China? Who feels with the Hindus, because rays of Indian enlightenment, which illumined half Asia, have even penetrated Europe? or with the Mohammedans, because they bore a chief part in bridging over the dark ages, that knowledge might pass from the classical to the modern world? Who admires the Jews, because Moses and Christ were of their race? Gratitude does not inherit from generation to generation, and from epoch to epoch. We have entered upon a career of advancement which has left Asia far behind; we have inherited or attained a mental symmetry, a balance of the powers of observation, reflection, and fancy, to which the one-sidedness and intensity of the Orientals are distasteful; and our want of sympathy makes us intolerant: we depreciate their personal character, contemn their literature, and stigmatize their religion as childish superstition or as devil-worship.

This would be less to be deprecated, if our feeling of superiority expressed itself in mental acts alone. But, just as soon as we set down a race as inferior, we begin to hold ourselves absolved from treating it with social and political justice. Injustice to inferiors, indeed, is one of the ruling principles of human activity. The kingdom of heaven may be the appointed inheritance of the poor in spirit; but the good things of earth are for those who can win and keep them. Even as between man and man, in our own community, the stronger takes advantage of the weaker, the knowing of the ignorant, our Christianity to the contrary notwithstanding. Because the African race is decidedly beneath the European in the sum of its endowments, instead of lending it a helping hand to enable it to secure its utmost share of happiness and elevation, we grind it beneath us, in varying degree and manner, from the servitude to which the South would fain still condemn it, to the exclusion from rights allowed and secured to all other manhood to which it is subjected by a part even of freedom-loving New England. Our conduct toward the Indian tribes is directly calculated to sweep them off the face of the earth; and we who, as individuals, would not think of shooting or starving a Sioux or a Blackfoot, in order to get him out of our way, do it as a nation, and are ready to flatter ourselves that we are only instruments in the hands of Providence to carry out its designs. Why should not the lower race give way to the higher, that the sum of human happiness may be increased?

The Oriental nations have had their full share of this kind of treatment to endure. European culture and Christianity are far superior to all the forms of civilization and all the religious isms of Asia; and these, with the peoples who live by them, must yield place or be crushed. Their rights, as individuals and as communities, are little in our eyes compared with the rights of a higher humanity, which we represent. The general intercourse between European and Asiatic powers has been marked with encroachment and oppression on the part of the former. No doubt that in nearly every specific act the European power has been speciously in the right. It is easy for the superior to put the inferior in the wrong, and to exact the penalty. That the British East India government should derive its richest item of revenue from opium raised expressly to be smuggled into China is highly proper, a part of the glorious system of free production and free trade; they did not take the abominable drug to China and force it into the nostrils of the people. But when the Chinese government, smarting under the results of this innocent arrangement, and feeling about blindly and impotently for means to check and prevent the traffic, lays its hands on the sacred person of a British diplomatic agent, the laws of nations are outraged, and the war waged to avenge the injury is a just one; its effect, that all resistance to the introduction of opium relaxes, is only incidental and unavoidable. It is very wrong for the Japanese to shut themselves straitly up, letting none go out and none come in, excluding their own countrymen whom misfortune at sea has carried to foreign ports, treating as intruders and spies the shipwrecked of other nations; and to break down the barrier by mingled intimidation and cajolery is a laudable deed—even though it lead them, by an unavoidable sequence of causes and effects, to intestine dissension and foreign war. We want to bind all parts of the earth together by the ties of commerce, of a mutual supply of wants, certain that we shall profit thereby, and confident that others will, or may, or ought to, do the same. We are apostles of the fraternity of nations, and we cannot let our propagandism be obstructed, even though our invitation, in itself not much different from that of the French revolutionist, Sois mon frère, ou je te tue! sounds in the ears of those to whom it is addressed ominously like "be my brother, and I destroy thee!" If the unrestricted interference of the West in the affairs of the civilized East is to lead to the overthrow of all that the Eastern peoples hold most dear—their religions, their forms of polity, their inherited usages, even their nationality—their right, in the interest of self-preservation, to resist the beginnings of such a revolution is greater than our right to urge it upon them.

But what, it may be asked, has all this to do with Mr. Alger's book of Oriental poetry? The connection is not difficult to point out. The highest significance of such a work lies in its interest and effect in bringing the Orient to the knowledge and sympathizing regard of the cultivated in our community, the leaders of public opinion. To win for the African the rights to which, as a human being among human beings, he is entitled, we have to prove him by his gifts a full man, to show that he is in many respects equal, in some, perhaps, superior, to ourselves; that he can think, feel, plan, act, fight even, like a real man, made in the image of God. In like manner, our general public need to be made to realize much more fully than at present that the Oriental is our brother in intellect as in destiny; that his soul will cry out as loudly to its Maker under injustice and oppression as would that of the European. This is a task in which scholars who have worked themselves into a comprehension and appreciation of the Orient, who know and feel what it has been and still is worth in the sum of humanity, have got to bear a chief part. And to do so is Mr. Alger's distinct aim. He is one of those who acknowledge a deep sympathy with some of the peculiarities of the Eastern mind; he regards it as in many of its qualities of a finer temper than our own, and is bent upon winning for it from his contemporaries the same admiration and reverence with which it inspires himself. In this view, his effort is worthy of all respect and approval.

That he has not failed of a fair share of success, is proved by the fact that a large earlier edition of his volume, from which this is but slightly altered, has been absorbed by our reading public within a few years. Yet, notwithstanding this authoritative sanction, we must confess ourselves less satisfied with the execution of the work than with its intent. Mr. Alger lays no claim to the character of an Oriental scholar; what he gives us he gets himself at second hand. Perhaps for this reason his collection is wanting in scholarly method. The pieces of which it is made up, its specimens of Oriental thought and fancy, run one after another in the accidental order of a commonplace-book, without attempt at arrangement of any kind by subject, by country, or by period. They are, too—and this is a much more serious defect—of heterogeneous character, translations from Oriental originals, translations from Oriental imitators, and original imitations of Oriental thought and style. Much the greater part of the extracts is referred to no authority whatever; we can only guess by their contents from what language and people they come. This requires us to trust more to our author than we feel ready to do. How know we that he is so penetrated with the Oriental spirit that all he gives us is genuinely Oriental? May we not be taking in a larger share of Mr. Alger himself than we at first suspect, or than we care to receive? It needs a rare power of self-abnegation, and some devoted scholarship, to put one into a mental and moral posture so different from ours as is the Oriental. Goethe's "West-Eastern Divan" is a masterpiece; but not only was Goethe himself a master, one of the very greatest the world has ever seen, but he had steeped himself in a particular part of Orientalism, and reproduced only that. And there is a certain sameness of tone running through all our author's selections which cannot but strike us as being more than we should fairly anticipate as the result of that unity of spirit which, in virtue of their common quality of "Oriental," ought to characterize the productions of so diverse races and periods. Of sharp-cut versions, which have the ring of an original, and make a strong individual impression, we find few or none; in every line we see most conspicuous the hue of the translator's ink. The translations which he cites in his introduction are to his disadvantage, as suggesting unfavorable comparisons between their life and vigor and that which his own pieces exhibit.

The introduction, which constitutes nearly a third of the volume, must not be passed by without some special notice. It would be quite as proper to call it, instead of an introduction, an independent essay, a panegyric of Eastern poetry, illustrated with specimens, to which, by way of appendix, are added a number of original versifications by the author. It points out what has been done, chiefly on the continent of Europe, toward rendering the productions of the Asiatic muse accessible to Western readers, and then attempts to describe their distinguishing characteristics. The classification adopted for them is a very strange one, namely, into Arab, Hindu, Persian, and Sûfi poetry: which is somewhat as if one were to divide southern European poetry into French, Spanish, Italian, and dramatic. What Mr. Alger writes upon these themes will be read with pleasure, save as some will be startled, and perhaps filled with misgiving as to the effect of conversance with Oriental models, by the flood of gorgeous diction which comes so easily from his pen, bathing and almost drowning his subject in a sea of eulogy. He is justified in his claim that no account of Oriental poetry, as a whole, exists within reach of the English reader. Nor can we expect that the want will ever be satisfactorily filled. Those who best understand the matter are those who will be least likely to attempt it. Scanned from a distance, and with a superficial eye, the poetry of Asia seems one whole, having a common character; but when examined more closely, better comprehended, it is seen to be as heterogeneous, as full of variety, as that of the West. One distinctive feature it has: it is not the reflex of European culture; any other would be hard to find, unless it be the immoderateness, the want of harmonious counterpoise, to which we have already once referred. The Asiatic literary historian, of whatever nation, were he treating the whole vast theme of the productions of the human imagination, would doubtless reverse our procedure, by separately describing the national literatures of Asia, and grouping those of Europe together as "Occidental." And he would be more in the right than we. Classical culture and the imitation of classical models bind a tie of unity about all that Europe and her colonies have produced; there is no such bond connecting Arab, Chinese, and Hindu literatures, nor could any discordance, in respect to national style and character, be greater than that between these three countries.

He who comes to Mr. Alger's volume with a right apprehension of what he is to look for in it—not a thorough and systematic illustration of wit and fancy, but a miscellaneous collection of observations and specimens, desultory reading for leisure hours—will be able to derive from it both amusement and instruction.

COLE'S BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY.*

THIS neatly and correctly printed little volume will be found a very useful hand-book, affording "ready information of the births and deaths of deceased persons, more or less noteworthy, of all countries and periods." The author modestly hopes—and we trust his hope will not be deceived—that it will "lie upon the desk, an unobtrusive companion of other books of many sorts, to give a reader its rapid answer whenever he is tempted to pause at a name, and ask no more than 'When did he live?'" This curiosity he satisfies in the plainest and shortest way, generally in a line to a query. The additions attached to the names and dates, which also answer the question "Who was he?" or "What has he done?" are not intended to furnish a condensed biography, but chiefly to identify the individuals. The italics within brackets indicate some production of the pen or some work of art—whenever possible, a chef d'œuvre; the italics without brackets indicate a second, an assumed, or an original name. Biographies of the subject are referred to thus: "Life by . . ." or "L. by . . ." When we add that this biographical dictionary contains no less than eighteen thousand names, and that the author has labored with conscientious zeal and rare diligence in verifying his dates, the reader will at once perceive how much benefit he may derive from such a companion of his literary occupations.

On the other hand, we cannot but regret that the author has not also bestowed on his work the attention and labor necessary to make it complete, uniform, and as correct in everything else as it is in dates. His acquaintance with English, French, and classical history and literature, and the use of a number of standard guides to biographical knowledge, have enabled him to perform parts of his task thoroughly and accurately; in others he has been less successful, chiefly from want of discrimination in making the choice of his subjects. While thousands of names given might be eliminated without detriment to the plan of the book, other thousands, of real historical value, are wanted to make it complete. Of this an American reader will easily be convinced, when, after finding on its first page a list of such names as C. C. H. vander Aa, P. vander Aa, N. Aagard, C. Aagard, E. Aalst, W. Aalst, A. Aaron, Aaron Acharon, P. Aarsens, F. van Aarsens, Aartgens, Abano, Abascal, Abate, Abati, Abatini, Abauzit, Abbadie, etc., he will in vain look for the date of birth or death of such Americans of former or recent times as Hancock, Otis, Montgomery, Arnold, Sumpter, Marion, Mercer, Randolph, Benton, Douglas, Perry, John Brown, Foote, Kearney, or Reno. A Pole must be equally surprised not to find the names of such chief representatives of his country's ancient military or literary glory as Chodkiewicz, Zolkiewski, Czarnecki, and Kochanowski, or the names of the (now deceased) principal leaders in the memorable revolution of 1831—Wysocki, Chlopicki, Dwernicki, Skrzynecki, and Dembinski, whom not even a fifth-rate general history or biographical cyclopædia will pass over in silence. A Hungarian will not only miss the equally renowned heroes and martyrs of his late struggle, Damjanics, Nagy Sándor, Csányi, and Széchenyi, but also such old historical names as King John Zápolya, Bocskai, and the elder Zrinyi—the Leonidas of modern times—though he may discover his Hunyady, Tökölyi, and Rákóczy, if he knows that the English persist in calling them Hunniades, Tekeli, and Ragotski. Hardly less grievous is the omission of such modern historical or literary names—Italian, German, Greek, and Servian—as Leopardi, Colletta, Bandiera, and Ruggiero; Schill, Sand, Hebel, Immermann, and Lenau; Odysseus and Miaulis; Czerny George and Milosh. But even of modern French names, in spite of the author's diligent use of both the "Biographie Universelle" and "Nouvelle Biographie Générale," we find such as the following missing: Generals J. B. Cavaignac, M. Dumas, and Dampierre; Grégoire, Decazes, Godefroy Cavaignac, and Proudhon; and the regicides, Louvel, Alibaud, and Fieschi. Jewish history and literature, ancient as well as modern, are altogether very poorly represented. Not only are the non-royal biblical names, as Moses, Joshua, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezra, and Nehemiah, as it appears, consistently omitted—for reasons neither stated nor obvious—but also some of the most distinguished post-biblical names of Hebrew literature, as the Rabbis Solomon Isaaki, Nachmanides, and Solomon-ben-Meir, or the poets, Moses-ben-Ezra, M. H. Luzzato, and Wessely, are not to be found, while others incomparably less important are given.

Ignorance of the Hebrew language on the part of the author, and, probably, also, of his authorities, is the source of several errors. Thus Hillel the Elder is designated Hassa Ken, which stands for Ha-Zaken or Haz-Zaken (Heb., ha, the, and zaken, old); R. Albe's Sepher ha-ikkarim ("Book of Principles"), is called Sepher Hikkarim; the surname of one Rabbi Juda is given in this way, Hakkadosh, and that of another thus, Ha-Levi, though ha is the same definite article in both. German words and titles are rarely given, but not without errors. The French and Italian are well handled, still we find Litéraire (one t, p. 208), Memoirs sur Napoleon (without accents, p. 3), Ercole de (not di or da) Ferrara (p. 205), and similar slight mistakes. The names of the subjects, probably for typographical reasons, are all given without accents, which makes many look very awkward, as D'Estrees, Fenelon, Stael, Cambaceres, Arpad, Kolcsey, Blucher, Muller, etc. The Russian broad o, preceded by o, in the termination of family names, is represented in all possible ways, as in Ivan*off*, Volk*off*, Nakhim*ov*, and Kracheninnik*ow*. "Der*schawin*, or Der*zh*avine," which is a mixture of German, English, and French, is another exemplification of our careless way of spelling names of nations whose alphabet is not the Roman. From the author's general rule of giving all common Christian names only in English, the Hungarian names, as attached to Katona, Kazinczy, Petoefi, and others, seem to form the only exception. The Vladislases of Hungary are erroneously mixed up with the Ladislases. King Stephen II., of the same nation, the emperor of the East, Michael II., and the Lewises of Germany receive their surnames in French, as given in the author's principal authorities for non-English biography, thus: Le Foudre, Le Bêgue, Le Jeune, L'Aveugle, L'Enfant—while the surnames of the French Charleses are given in English, the Bold, the Fat, the Fair, the Wise, etc. We find, also, some inaccurate dates of reigns, as 1204 for 1205, 1826 for 1825, and 1857 for 1858, under Andrew II., Nicholas, and Frederic William IV.

Repetitions, instead of references, are frequent, being mostly intentional, and caused by differences of names or spelling, or by such additional syllables as de, di, da, del, etc., but, we must confess, in their discrepancies they often reveal an uncommon degree of haste in compiling or copying, to say the least. A few examples will suffice as illustrations:

"Cosmo II. de Medici. Grand Duke of Tuscany. Life by Aldus Manutius, Jun., 1585. Born 1519—died Apr. 21, 1574."

"Medici, Cosmode. The Great. 1st Grand-duke of Tuscany. Life by Baldini. Born 1519—died Apr. 21, 1574."

"De Gerando, Joseph Mary, Baron. Fr. Statesman."

"Gerando, Joseph Mary, Baron de. Fr. Philosoph. Writer."

That of the titles attached to the eighteen thousand names many are inaccurate, will surprise nobody. Thus, Bolivar, the deliverer of half a continent, is called the "Liberator of Bolivia;" Benyowsky, who was born in Hungary, and roamed all over the world, a "Polish Adventurer;" and Solomon ben Virga, a "Spanish Rabbi" of the "16th cent.," in which there were no Jews in Spain. Such and similar errors or inaccuracies, we trust, the diligent author will eliminate by scores from his valuable work, "in revising each successive edition that may be called for." In the next, we hope to find the date of President Lincoln's birth added to that of his death, which is given.

TWO MEN.*

WHEN you have read this novel you feel as if you had been at the play, and, though you are ever so dull a man, you are conscious that hidden springs of epigram have been touched in your nature, and that it is in you for the moment to talk brilliantly. You wish, also, to express yourself violently and recklessly, with an oath or two, and you confess in various ways the frank, vehement power of the romance. It is very interesting; and although most old travellers in fable-land might guess the end when the journey is half done, few would care to turn aside from it there.

It is a very curious book, for two reasons: the analysis of character which the taste of this age demands is dramatic, and the most subjective purpose is achieved by the most objective processes. The author seldom vouchsafes a word of comment or explanation on anything that her people do or say; and yet, from their brief speeches and dramatic action, you have the same knowledge of motive which you acquire from the philosophization of some such subjective romance as "The Scarlet Letter." We think this admirable, because it wisely satisfies the analytic tendency of modern feeling, and yet escapes the motionlessness of a study. The book is also curious because, with many improbabilities and incongruities, it leaves at last an impression of reality, and of propriety within certain conditions, which must be granted the author as they must be granted to every artist. We may protest that we never knew any such town as Crest, and that we never met such invariably bright, bad people as live there, but we must nevertheless acknowledge the truth of the characters to themselves, to each other, and to the atmosphere in which we find them. It is at times an atmosphere in which only eldritch and unearthly things could breathe.

The story is briefly this: Jason Auster, a young carpenter, who comes to the seaport town of Crest, in New England, with certain vague aspirations and theories for the reform and universal happiness of our race, marries there Sarah Parke, the grand-daughter of the selfish, self-sufficing old Squire Parke, and lapses from his high dreams into a repressed, useless life of ease and silent discontent. He is nothing in the house while the old squire lives, and he is never anything but the father of his wife's son and her skilful business-man while she lives. There is no love between them and no dislike, and it does not seem that there is any more positive feeling, except a tardy tenderness and respect in the son, between Jason and his child, from youth to manhood. The father never interferes with the education of the boy, who grows as selfish and bad as his good nature will let his mother make him. Shortly after the old squire's death, a scapegrace cousin of Sarah's returns from many years' vagabondage in South America, bringing with him his daughter Philippa, and leaves her to his cousin's conscientious care and cold dislike. There has been some early passion for this Osmond Luce in Sarah's heart, but she has never forgiven him for leaving home and her, and she feels now no tenderness for him or his. Naturally, Philippa falls in love with her beautiful cousin, Parke Auster—Sarah's son—and sets her whole, strange, loveless life on his possession. This hope of Philippa's is threatened at one time by the charms of a beautiful friend, Theresa Bond, who comes to visit her, and with whom Parke seems for a time to be in love; and it is at last broken by Parke's guilty passion for an octoroon girl who has come to live in Crest with her mother and sister. Parke, whose nature is good and generous, is about to repair his wrong as far as possible by marrying Charlotte Lang, when his mother dies of broken pride—heart she seems to have none—and Charlotte dies in giving birth to his child. He causes her to be laid, as his wife, in the burial-place of the Parkes, and openly owns the Langs as his kindred before the world. Philippa's father being again returned from the pampas, Parke determines to go back to South America with him, and does so, Philippa confessing her love for him, and killing it in the parting. He never appears in Crest again.

Now it is the time for Philippa and Jason, the evident affinities, to draw near to each other, and find in one another's hearts that relief, expression, and repose which has been denied to both all their lives. Jason has long loved Philippa, but, discerning her love for Parke, has done all he could to stifle his own love and to bring about the fruition of her passion. But his efforts and hers have failed, and he now opens his heart to her. There is no good reason why Philippa should not respond at once to his love, but it is not till he has shot off his hand, and she has nursed him through a fever, that she finds she loves him, and it is not till he has objectlessly gone out West and come back again, that they finally understand each other, and wed—which ends the story.

It is a pity that the author should have needlessly weakened the dénoûment of her story, and united the lovers by a device which, in various disguises, has already done such veteran service in fiction. We believe that in some thousands of modern novels obdurate heroines have been softened into marriageable humor by the mutilation and fever of the heroes, and we are sorry to be reminded at last of what is commonplace by what is otherwise eminently original. In plot, in character and treatment, "Two Men" is one of the most original books written by an American woman; it is original in its goodness and in its badness; the author's faults (except the one already mentioned), like her merits, are almost wholly her own, and not Miss Shepherd's, as in the works of Miss Prescott, nor Charlotte Brontë's, as in the works of Miss Hardinge.

We conceive the main purpose of the book to be the contrast of the characters of the father and son, Jason and Parke, the two men, who have many salient points in common. The characters of both are grounded in goodness of nature, but Parke's life is spoiled by selfishness so thorough and supreme as to be without a consciousness of what it is. He is good through intuition and impulse, and what good he does finds positive and generous expression, while his father's goodness throughout consists in self-repression and silent self-sacrifice. He also has little self-consciousness, and his control over himself is so great that his sufferings, like his longings, are for the most part dumb. The author has not, however, developed his character sufficiently, and, on the whole, the contrast is not satisfactorily effected. In Philippa there is little character apart from her relentless passion for Parke, which almost accomplishes fruition by virtue of faith and hope in itself. Sarah's nature is mute, hard, cold, detestable, without anything active in it but dislikes and dull ambitions. Theresa Bond is the humanest woman in the book: brilliant, warm, capable of loving simply and naturally, though she is full of pretty artifice and sweet egotism. We like, also, the vagabond Osmond Luce, whose character is so admirably indicated, on the occasions of his rare appearance, that we know the good-humored, bad-hearted, engaging, worthless wanderer much better than either Parke or Jason. The Langs are perhaps, however, the most successful creations in the book; they are marvellously well done. Mrs. Lang has been sent to Crest by her master and lover, with their two children, and her whole career and being are thus summed up:

"The glitter of negro blood was in Mrs. Lang's eyes, and the negro modulation in her voice; her complexion was a deep yellow, and she wore a wig of dark, straight hair. Though past middle age, her carriage was still splendid. She had been a lithe, sinewy, gay savage, but her day was over; a double expression was dominant in her face now—of weariness, from some long-continued strain, and of repose, because of safety attained. Her manners reflected the hut, the boudoir, and the Methodist gatherings of plantation slaves."

The daughters, also, are indicated with a like freedom and adequacy:

"Clarice had a brilliant, swarthy complexion, shining, curly, black hair, large black eyes with a vindictive sparkle, and manners which were a mixture of the sulky and the vivacious. Charlotte reminded one of the Calla Ethiopia, she was so tall, slender, bending, and graceful, her complexion so smooth and opaque, and the curves of her face so beautiful. Her lips were always parted, her wistful light-blue eyes widely opened, and her straight, silky, chestnut hair disordered. She impressed those who saw her with a pitying admiration, a wondering regret, and a mysterious doubt."

We think Mrs. Stoddard succeeds better with these people than with most others in her book, because she keeps them in their place, as the folks at Crest did. They seldom rise to those heights of epigram on which the other characters tread, and in their simple, vulgar presence one feels a curious relief from the intensity which pursues one through the book. This quality, which occasionally takes a white heat of fierceness, is so prevalent as at last to enfeeble and destroy the very effects sought to be produced. The billow which seemed destined to overwhelm you breaks at last in its frenzy into a weak foam, and your face is dashed with spray when you waited to be swept down to gulfs of feeling. This fault of the author's attacks nearly all her descriptions of nature, and dwells properly on her text, where trees, hills, valleys, streams, and clouds are of a phantasmal strangeness. Mrs. Stoddard is one of the few people who might write much more with the hope of writing much better, because the bad habit of intensity can hardly attend great fertility of literary production.

Apart from this intensity, the literature of the book is excellent. The style is exquisitely clear and sharp-cut; the reader is hurried to the end with a tireless succession of events, and there is a peculiar pleasure and repose to the interest in being made to rest at last solely on the fortunes of Philippa and Jason. Altogether the novel must be accepted as an original expression of American feeling, and its characters, however exceptional, as veritable American types.

THE SLAVE POWER.*

It is well known how much the rebel chiefs did in Europe to pervert public opinion, and how little was done by the Government of the Union to frustrate their efforts. Almost all that has been done to enlighten the people of Europe on the causes and the aims of the rebellion is due to the patriotism of private citizens. Correspondents of English, German, French, and Italian papers have sent truthful accounts of our great struggle, and many noble Europeans devoted themselves to the Union, and the nation owes them a debt of gratitude; but, above all, this debt of gratitude is due to the American citizens abroad who, in the gloomiest days of our civil war, never despaired of their country—who, in the midst of enemies or lukewarm lookers-on, rose as defenders of its cause.

Among these devoted citizens Mr. Theodore S. Fay, formerly Resident Minister of the United States in Switzerland, deserves to be mentioned as one of the most effective defenders of the Union. Residing at Berlin, the intellectual capital of Germany, he met with two rebel emissaries—Mr. James Williams, ex-minister of the United States at Constantinople, and a Mr. Hudson, styling himself secretary of legation of the United States—hard at work to misrepresent the cause of the North in the eyes of the German people, whose sympathies with the United States are of such great importance for the development of the prosperity and power of the Republic.

Mr. Fay attacked and defeated the rebel emissaries by laying our national records before the German people, and by showing them how, from the cradle of our independence to the outbreak of the rebellion, the slaveholding aristocracy had conspired for the destruction of the Union in order to build up that edifice whose corner-stone was to be slavery. Speeches have been made and pamphlets published in England and France on the same side more eloquent and brilliant than Mr. Fay's little book, but we are fully convinced that nothing more effective has been spoken or published abroad. Long after the excitement of the fierce struggle will have subsided, Mr. Fay's book will pass in Germany from hand to hand as the best epitome of the history of the Union; and no better refutation of the many falsehoods disseminated in Europe by the rebel agents could have been supplied than his condensed historical sketch showing the origin and progress of the colonies, their struggle against English despotism, the long conspiracy of the slaveholders, the forbearance of the free North, and, finally, the unavoidable necessity of crushing the rebellion in order to save the nation.

Written in the German language, the style of Mr. Fay's book is clear, concise, and striking, because there is no attempt to strengthen truth by rhetorical flourishes. The author lets the facts speak for themselves. He gives the history of the United States from the beginning to the present day in short paragraphs; all are excellent. Among the most important ones we mention the comparison between the revolution of 1776 and the rebellion of 1860, the chapters on State sovereignty, the Monroe doctrine, and the struggle against the slaveholding aristocracy. Step by step Mr. Fay leads us to the outbreak of that long-prepared rebellion. He shows the barbarism of its principles by quoting its Southern defenders, and its unprovoked criminality by the declarations of the originators of the civil war. No intelligent reader can peruse this résumé of the history of the United States without acquiring a correct insight into our past, a just appreciation of the late fierce struggle, and full faith in our future. He will recognize what the author says in his preface:

"No thoughtful observer can let the panorama of history pass before his eyes without seeing the perpetual combat of evil against good. There has always been a great battle raging; but, alas! the victory has not always been on the side of good. . . . I do not intend to write a history of the United States, but simply to demonstrate by a short sketch how the battle between good and evil has been carried over from the Old World to the New."

Mr. Fay's little book has taught, and will continue to teach, the German people that the victory won this time by the good is not only an American victory, but a victory of the human race.

ART NOTES.

On the northern coast of Sicily, about ten miles east from Palermo and near the little town Castello di Solanto, a search is being carried on among the almost wholly buried ruins of a very ancient city. These ruins are, perhaps, to be identified as the remains of the ancient city of Soluntum; but, as the Soluntum of the Romans was a place of little importance, and completely overshadowed by the neighboring seaport and naval station Panormus (Palermo), we must look further back than the times of the Roman o minion for many of the relics that are found. Their character confirms this Pompeian remains are modern in comparison with the venerable antiquity of the buildings explored and the movables found in this spot. Traces of a civilization long anterior even to the Carthaginian conquest of Sicily are found, relics and indications of the dominion of the Phœnician colonizers, and even, think the enthusiastic antiquaries, of the oldest civilization of all —that of the Titan or pre-historic inhabitants of the island. For several years these researches have been carried on in a desultory way, enriching the Museum of Palermo, but producing little other result. Within two years a more definite end has been proposed, and the ruins are to be systematically brought to light and preserved from injury. The city cannot, however, be so complete as Pompeii, having been ruined by fire and by decay, without the protecting enclosure of sand and ashes. Up to this time the small treasures of bronze, pottery, and glass have been more valuable than anything found in immediate connection with buildings. The glass has been especially abundant and beautiful—many pieces but little injured, and of very great artistic merit both in form and in color. The collection of coins, also, already made from among these instructive ruins is very rich and of high historical value.

—Researches have begun among some ruins less ancient but far more interesting than those of Soluntum. A paragraph in the Constitutionnel tells us of the commencement of a careful examination of the ruins of Château Gaillard. Those who know Turner's "Rivers of France" will remember the two prints—"Château Gaillard from the South," shown perched on the precipitous rock that rises three hundred feet above the Seine; "Château Gaillard from the East," standing in the foreground at our feet, while the vast extent of country south of the Seine stretches away towards Evreux. These glorious landscapes are the principal bond between modern times and the Insolent Castle, but the castle has a great record, which makes an important chapter in mediæval history. It was built by Richard the Lion-Hearted on the top of the lofty and precipitous rock of Andely, and the town of Petit-Andely clustered around the foot of the crag. It was the greatest fortress in Europe, the most impregnable, the most skilfully placed and constructed—a castle to which Ehrenbreitstein and Rudolstadt were border towers of no importance. "C'est un château gaillard," cried Richard himself, as it approached completion, and the name remained. No king but John Lackland could have managed to lose his hold upon the defiant fortress, but Philippe Auguste took it from him, and it never passed into English hands again. Henri Quatre dismantled it and Louis Treize destroyed it, for fear some disaffected or rebellious people might be too "gaillards," with the castle to shelter in. But it has been a shelter for fugitives and a state prison for offenders of the blood royal, and its ruins hide more of the strange and beautiful than has yet been found; coins, glassware, pottery, and metal-work have already been exhumed, and the hunt goes on. If these researches will help to throw light on the little understood subject of early mediæval pottery, they will have been most useful.

—A series of photographs has been published under the title, "Rays of Sunlight from South America." There are seventy pictures, and they form a small oblong folio volume bound in morocco, and offered to subscribers at the price of one hundred dollars. Of the pictures more than half are views in the city of Lima; the remainder are scenes on the Chincha Islands. The negatives were taken by H. Moulton, and the positives are printed in Washington by Alexander Gardner. In the specimen book the somewhat affected title is not very appropriate, for the prints are not very clear nor so sharp in their shadows and strong in their lights as to look at all sunny. Careful printing would produce a much better result; most of the negatives, at least, would allow of better prints than these, and we hope that the subscribers will receive better treatment than they are promised. Of the Lima pictures many are very uninteresting, and represent quite unimportant scenes. The best are those which represent, on a tolerably large scale, the extraordinary architecture and external decorations of some of the important churches. There is some European architecture of the decadence that is somewhat like this, but these church fronts excel in quaintness anything we can recall of European work. We mention as worthy of notice the photographs of Trinity Church, the Church of San Francisco, and of the façade of the Church of Mercy. The statues of Bolivar and of Columbus are interesting; the former is a well known work of sculpture. Besides these, the Ruins of the Aqueduct and the Southern Gate of Lima are worth looking at carefully. The Chincha Island photographs, though often very obscure and vague, are interesting. They show the whole process of quarrying and shipping guano. The Panorama of North Island, with part of the Fleet waiting for Guano, is contained in two pictures; that of Middle Island in two more. The Great Heap, which is estimated to contain two million tons of guano, affords the subject for several of these pictures. It is a pity these photographs are not better; and it would be better for the people, if not for the publishers, if these pictures could be bought separate from the volume. The publishers are Philp (not Philip) & Solomons, of Washington, D. C. The agents in New York are Baragwanath & Van Wisker, of 200 Broadway.

—Of the interior decoration of the best houses in our great cities, which wealthy men have built for their own use, the mantels of dining-rooms, drawing-rooms, and libraries are important features. The old-fashioned box, made up of thin marble boards, has been superseded by solid constructions of carved wood or elaborately veneered pieces of cabinet work, or, in a few cases, by actual carved marble, not in thin slabs, but in solid masonry. A very splendid chimney-piece in a bank on Broadway is composed entirely of cut-stone of the same sort as that of which the exterior of the building is made, and the shelf it carries is of Lisbon marble. This would be too huge and bulky for most dwelling houses, and means are used in these to make the mantels rich and costly and unusual in appearance, while remaining delicate in their parts. Not long since a splendid one was to be seen, before it was packed to be sent away, composed entirely of wood, but comprising eleven varieties of wood, all showing their natural colors and natural grain. A costly mantel-piece in New York is composed, indeed, of walnut, but is decorated with little disks and tablets of rare and valuable marble which are inlaid in its front. But all these wonderful things are but the triumphs of to-day; to-morrow's successes will surpass them in beauty and in artistic merit, if not in costliness. We chronicle, for those who seek some new thing, some chimney-pieces we hear of through private letters or European journals. First, an English gentleman (and we understand that he is but one of many) has returned to the Dutch tiles of his grandfather's boyhood—Dutch "Scripture" tiles in blue and white, tiles with Bible scenes represented on them, tiles such as those from which Watts learned his Bible history. Probably the outer face only of the fire-place is finished with these. The mosaic and encaustic tiles of Minton and Maw have been used for the back and sides of the fire-place, and for the hearth, so often that this plan of fire place is no longer novel. Second, a Prussian gentleman has put into a villa he has built near Potsdam a chimney-piece (the idea of which must have been taken from a well-known saloon in the palace of Sans Souci) "entirely of malachite." Of course malachite veneering is meant; the malachite vases and tables which have been favorite presents from czars to brother potentates, and which are to be seen in almost every royal gallery in Europe, are all veneered. Third, two chimney-pieces have been exhibited in the Paris exhibition of the arts applied to industry, one wholly of bronze, the other of bronze and marble, both, it seems, of oriental design, the former including careful castings made from models brought from Egypt. (This work was probably done with greater care and more knowledge than Sir Walter Scott's cast in iron of a stone piscina in Melrose Abbey, which seemed to him a suitable thing for a fire-place.) One exhibitor was guilty of an Hibernicism at the opening of the exhibition, when being taken unprepared, he put up the following announcement: "These chimney-pieces are ornamented with bronzes. The bronzes will be affixed next Sunday."

MUSIC.

MUSIC OF THE WEEK.

Mr. Maretzek's practice of repeating a number of old operas once, while he is preparing the new ones, has the advantage of allowing us to refresh our memories and to renew our old judgments. We can reconsider them and affirm or revise them as time and experience have taught us. So, after hearing a great quantity of Verdi and a very little of Bellini, Gounod, Flotow, and Petrella, we were given a morsel of Donizetti. On Tuesday "Lucrezia Borgia" was given, and on Wednesday "Lucia di Lammermoor." Donizetti stands as a composer half-way between Rossini and Verdi. He puts less recitative and more well-marked airs into his operas than Rossini, and is also inferior to him in the orchestration. His choruses are less grand and effective, and those in both "Lucrezia" and "Lucia" are very like anything that Verdi himself would have written, in their unisons and general lack of character and coloring. He is superior to Verdi in having purer and more delicate melodies and less coarseness of thought and execution. These two operas may be regarded as the best examples of the best period of their author's works, "La Favorita" and "La Figlia del Reggimento" being the only other two that approach them in excellence. His early operas, which, by the pressure of narrow means, he produced at the rate of two and three a year, have already, with one or two exceptions, passed into oblivion, and those written subsequently to this, though sometimes played, are neither popular nor have much intrinsic excellence. "Don Sebastiano," the best of them, never succeeded. "Lucia" was produced at Naples in 1835, and contains the best finale—the sextett of the second act—in any of his voluminous writings, sixty-three operas in all, and is replete with beautiful and touching airs, all of which are perfectly familiar to every one. "Lucrezia" was written for Milan in the previous year, and was reproduced at Paris in 1840. The story was taken from Victor Hugo's drama of "Lucrèce Borgia," and, as soon as the opera was brought out, Hugo, feeling his rights as an author infringed upon, commenced a suit, which was decided in his favor, and the opera was withdrawn from the stage. The Italians were transformed into Turks, and the work was successfully played under the name of "La Rinegata." In the provinces it was also called "Nizza di Grenada." It is finer, as a whole, than "Lucia," both musically and dramatically. The most striking scene in the opera, between Gennaro and Lucrezia in the first act, is, however, badly managed, and the interest either lost or obscured. The act should have ended before all the company of friends rushed upon the stage. Miss Phillips sang the part of Orsini with great spirit, and rendered the Brindisi better than it has been given to the American public in very many years. Mrs. Zucchi's voice sounded weak and thin after hearing the beautiful singing of Miss Parepa, but we cannot too loudly applaud her acting. Her thorough conscientiousness and earnestness can be seen from many little things, for instance, the way in which she clutched and clasped to her heart the extended hand of Gennaro in the scene where she saves him from death from the poison he had just drunk. Miss Ortolani quite surprised us in Lucia by the great improvement in her voice and manner. Her acting was not bad, and her singing was sympathetic and correct. She will never make a great singer, but will be always useful in parts which require a good voice and good acting, but which are not considered leading ones.

The concert season has fairly begun. The Arion Society commenced with their excellent vocal and instrumental concert, at which they presented several novelties, among others a fine chorus by Liszt. Mr. Bateman joined his company to the opera troupe, and on Tuesday and Wednesday of last week we were favored with concert as well as opera. On the first evening, the orchestra, under the admirable guidance of Mr. Theodore Thomas, played the overture to "William Tell" as well as it can be played here. The interest of the evening centered in Miss Parepa, who sang "Ernani involami" with remarkable power and brilliancy, without exaggeration, but purely and earnestly, and with careful finish. She made a very vivid impression on the audience, and inspired every one with the resolve to hear her as often as possible. Her voice is rich and full, and her execution is very easy. She slips from her low to her high notes and back without any perceptible effort, and her voice seems liquid as purest air. In the "Shadow Song" she showed that she was suffering with a cold, which prevented her from singing as easily and fluently as the piece requires. For "Il Bacio" she was obliged to substitute a simple ballad, "Five o'clock in the Morning," which she rendered very sweetly and pleasingly. Her English pronunciation and accent are quite perfect. It was a great cause of regret that her cold so gained on her that she could not sing the second evening, for Miss Kellogg by no means filled her place. Mr. Dannreuther is a good pianist, with a clear, sympathetic touch. His playing of Beethoven's concerto showed that he had good feeling for musical sentiment, and his execution of Liszt's "Rigoletto Fantasia" displayed his powers as a performer. Mr. Carl Rosa is an agreeable violinist. He is still young, and bids fair to become an artist. He showed, when he played so simply and so exquisitely "Auld Robin Gray," that he had qualities which only needed developing to put him high in the ranks of the meritorious. Mr. Levy comes here with a great English reputation, which he bids fair to keep and increase. The cornet-à-piston is a very difficult but a very beautiful instrument. In Mr. Levy's hands it almost changed its character, and from a brass horn became a silver flute. Some of his notes had a beautiful softness and delicacy, and only occasionally was there any blare of brassy sound. His execution is quite as good as that of Koenig. The "Whirlwind Polka," being very light and graceful, is well suited to showing the capacities of the instrument as regards softness and sweetness. The "Carnival of Venice" is more difficult, and fuller of technical points of skill. It was well executed, but was not so beautiful as the preceding piece.

MUSICAL TALK.

It is rather remarkable to what an extent Gounod's "Faust" is being played in Germany. Nearly every opera-house has it on its list as one of those works to be frequently represented. It was the same last winter; and this is in the face of much adverse criticism at first, when critics all declared that the drama was spoiled, and that the music had no character. One celebrated German musician said, "No, Germany will never endure such a sacrilege as Goethe's drama set by that Frenchman." The sacrilege, however, is not only endured but very much applauded. A French critic of German thought and tendencies tries to account for its success by saying that it was a necessity to the Germans to hear some work on that subject, and that Spohr's opera had held the stage for so long there, that it necessarily gave place to the newer and fresher work. But whatever the German critics say, actuated by their narrow feeling of nationality, the applause of the music-loving and music-knowing people of Germany have reversed their verdict. This is not the only French opera that they like. Many a work which has not been heard for years in France is repeated often every winter in Germany, such as Méhul's "Joseph" and Cherubini's "Deux Journées."

—The Abbé Liszt has recently appeared once more in public as a musician. It was at Pesth, on the occasion of the thirty-fifth jubilee of the Conservatory of Music of Pesth. The music performed was principally by Hungarian composers. Among other things there was the oratorio of "Saint Elizabeth," which Liszt had composed expressly for the anniversary. Since his taking holy orders he plays and composes nothing but sacred music. The subject is taken from the life of Saint Elizabeth of Hungary, whose story has been told us by Kingsley, and the poem is written by O. Roquette. The work is in two parts, each containing three scenes, three detached pictures from the life of the saint. Each scene is characterized by a single theme, well worked up with all that richness of harmony and instrumentation of which Liszt is the greatest living master. It is said that Liszt is now composing another oratorio called "Saint Stephen," which is destined to be performed at the coronation of the Emperor of Austria as King of Hungary, if that event ever takes place.

—Mr. Mellon, whose series of promenade concerts have lately been so popular in London, introduced, after the manner of Jullien, the feature of devoting special nights to the illustration of the great composers. Thus, he had a Spohr night, a Mozart night, and even a Gounod night. Historical concerts are a prominent feature in foreign musical performances. They are given every winter in Paris and London. Why cannot we have something of the kind here? The Philharmonic Society promises us a series of concerts, but they are confined to well-known composers and, with few exceptions, to well-known works. They teach us nothing of what has been done in the far past, and little of what is being done at present. This may be one reason why we are all so ignorant here of the history of music. A great composer can be only truly appreciated after hearing what his predecessors and contemporaries tried to do and failed. Will not Mr. Thomas revise his programmes, or give some extra concerts of an historical character?

Science.

In May last an ancient mound was opened on the land of Mr. G. A. Wilson, near the town of Newark, Licking County, Ohio, by a party of four citizens, and among such relics as are often found in many of our Western tumuli (human bones, implements of stone, etc.) a small stone was observed, nearly of the size and form of a hen's egg, covered with the indurated earth which had been dug away from above and around it. It was carved in the shape of an old man's head, and on the forehead were engraved five Hebrew letters, reading from right to left, jod (or vau), thof, nun, beth (or phi), lamed. A short horizontal line was between the first and second letters, and another between the second and third. After cleaning the stone, the Masoretic point tzere was discovered under the fourth letter. With most commendable zeal, measures were immediately taken to authenticate the facts and to communicate them to persons who would do them justice. Mr. J. N. Wilson and the Rev. Mr. Bowen wrote to the Rev. J. W. McCarty of Cincinnati (the learned first translator of the two remarkable Hebrew inscriptions discovered in 1860). Those gentlemen, in co-operation with Messrs. Dennis and Dr. M. C. Burkheart, and Gen. J. Dille, have sent to the American Ethnological Society in New York much interesting information concerning that stone, and another of a different form, which was found by Mr. Cooper in the same place a few days after. The letters, drawing, and photographs sent by them will doubtless be examined and reported on in due time. The stone last discovered appears to be a whitish limestone, is triangular, about three by three and a half inches, and one inch thick. It is carved in the form of an animal, with its feet resting on the backs of two elongated human heads. On one of the foreheads is inscribed the Hebrew letter shin; on the other, six letters; and on the side of the animal, four. The stones are such as are common in that region, and corroded by time. These new discoveries must give great additional interest to the contents of our Western mounds; and it is to be hoped that great care will be used in examining even the smallest objects taken from them.

—Mr. James Wilkenson, of Chelsea, England, burnt a quarter of a pound of phosphorus and nitrate of potash (cost only 4d.) in a garden at night, which made a strong light, seen two miles, and lasting six minutes, bringing out the fire engines. A photograph of the scene illuminated was taken, "equalling any picture taken on a bright day."

—The fumes from the extensive copper works at Swansea destroy vegetation for miles around, so that the smelters have to pay enormous sums in damages. Many plans have been projected to counteract the evil; and Messrs. Vivian & Son, smelters, have adopted the method of a German chemist, which they publicly declare is likely to succeed, and enable them to make 1,000 tons a week of sulphuric acid from the copper smoke, now worse than wasted.

—A new tanning process has been invented in France, by M. Picard, which is said by Le Noveliste to be cheaper and more expeditious than the old. By a mechanical process in the place of bark, hides are tanned into leather in twelve hours. Turpentine dissolves fat and preserves leather. The material used is 50 per cent. cheaper than bark; the process less laborious, oak forests will be benefited by leaving the bark on the trees and avoiding the treading down of young saplings, while the waste lands will be planted with fir trees, to produce turpentine. Manufacturers prefer the leather thus made.

—It is a mystery why certain savage and barbarous tribes, in different parts of the world, have different sets of numerals for several different classes of objects, as one set for men and animals; another for roundish objects, as cocoa-nuts, pebbles, etc.; a third for long things, like sticks, etc., etc. The Uniapa islanders are known to have five or six; some of the Micronesians, twelve or fifteen; and an old grammar of the Catchiquel language of Guatemala gives about forty.

—It has been proposed in England to hold a meeting of archæologists on Salisbury Plain, at Stonehenge, to make an excavation under the altar-stone, and raise the fallen Trilithon; but the owner of the ground, Sir Edward Antrobus, has refused to permit it.

—A reward was offered of £150 to £300 by Dr. Petermann, the German geographer, to any German mariner who would explore the currents of the sea between Spitzbergen and Nova Zembla this year; and a polar expedition started that way, expecting to be facilitated by the influence of the Gulf Stream, and the expenses paid by the fossil ivory to be brought back. The steamer broke her machinery and returned.

From the great success of this Company they are enabled to offer superior advantages to policy-holders.

Life policies are issued, payable in annual, or in one, five, or ten annual instalments; also non-forfeiture endowment policies, payable in ten annual payments, which are paid at death, or on arriving at any particular age. Life insurance, as an investment, has no superior, as it has saved millions of dollars to the insured, and thousands of families from ruin. Dividends are paid to policy-holders, thus enabling them to continue their policies, if otherwise unable to do so.

This favorable feature has been the means of saving many policies that would have been forfeited for want of means to continue them, and, in several instances, families once wealthy have thus been saved from utter ruin.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, is pursuing a journey through the South. His letters appear every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

105 STATE STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

Miners should not purchase machinery before seeing, or sending their friends to examine, the practical working of this series of machinery.

☞ The Whirling Table, or Crusher, weighs less than two tons, and crushes from ten to twelve tons of ore per hour to fine gravel, or two hundred and fifty tons in twenty-four hours.

The Pulverizer weighs two tons, and pulverizes to dust infinitely finer than stamp work, one ton of ore per hour, or twenty-four tons per diem, equal to the yield of twenty-five or thirty stamps; and the first cost and wear, as compared to this number of stamps, is about one-tenth;—the entire yield being fit for amalgamation without further reduction. The fine dust is not obtained by screening, but by the immediate action of the Pulverizer.

Fifteen horse-power, net, is the maximum power required for one machine.

The cost of the wear, per ton, is less than by any other machine. All wearing parts are now made of Franklinite iron.

Let miners and their friends carefully study the practical working of all other machines and processes offered, and then see ours working in East Boston, Mass. We ask only this.

All of our machines are now made in our own shop. No CONTRACT WORK.

Improvements in Piano-fortes.

One of the simplest and most truly valuable improvements yet made in the Piano-forte is that invented and patented by Mr. David Decker, of the firm of
in this city. By correcting the only imperfections arising from the use of the full iron-plate, and that, too, by not detracting in the slightest degree from its many positive advantages, the Messrs. DECKER have developed in their instruments a tone at once admirable for its purity, fulness, prolongation, and sweetness, and the high estimation in which their improvement is held is well shown in the rapidly increasing business of their firm.

The Week.

THE event of the past week has been the publication of the correspondence between Lord Russell and Mr. Adams. We have had a good illustration of the way in which the Washington telegrams are cooked up for the morning papers, in the fact that they contained the announcement on Friday that there had been a protracted Cabinet meeting held for the discussion of the affair, as if the correspondence were as new to the Cabinet as to the general public. Mr. Adams's last letter was written September 18, and has probably been in Mr. Seward's hands for two or three weeks. Abler diplomatic writing than Mr. Adams's has not appeared for many a day. The only improvement traceable in Lord Russell's is in temper. The fact appears in every line of his despatches as plain as a pikestaff, that the earlier policy of the English ministry was distorted by a mistaken estimate of the comparative strength of the belligerents; that they were under the impression that a new power was rising into existence in the Americas, with which they were desirous of establishing friendly relations, and acted accordingly; that they now see their mistake, and are very sorry, but will not make reparation. This is, of course, true only of the moderates who, like Russell himself, were not animated by positive hatred of the North. Some things in Mr. Adams's letter are almost cruel, such as his reply to his lordship's congratulations on the abolition of slavery.

A CONTROVERSY has been raging for nearly a week in the Times, Evening Post, and World as to whether Thurlow Weed did or did not "spurn" the proffered hand of Lucius Robinson on a certain day at "the south door of the Albany State House." No decision has as yet been reached, or is likely to be reached; and in the meantime the gravity with which the discussion is carried on is inexpressibly ludicrous. If Mr. Weed be as much impressed, as to judge from his letters to the newspapers he seems to be, with the importance of his own sayings, doings, and feelings to the general public, we would recommend the weekly or daily issue of a little sheet devoted exclusively to that subject. Most readers would prefer taking their daily dose of Weediana separate from the morning news.

Two recent judicial decisions are worthy of being recorded at this time. Three cases came up from the Supreme Court of this State to the Court of Appeals, involving the right of the State to tax the shareholders in national banks to the amount of their stock. The judgment was in favor of this power. The court admitted that the banking corporations themselves are not liable to taxation, in that they are instruments of the Federal Government, which, within the authority of the Constitution, is superior to the enactments of the several States. It is these corporations which are meant when the bonds of the United States are declared exempt from taxation—an elliptical expression for the owners thereof. The interest of an individual stockholder is collateral merely, and not proprietary, and that interest may be fairly taxed for the benefit of the State. The other decision to which we had reference is that of Judge Smalley, of the United States District Court for Vermont, who pronounces unconstitutional Section 4 of the Act of March 3, 1863 (empowering the President, during the rebellion, "to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in any case throughout the United States, or any part thereof"), which is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That any order of the President, or under his authority, made at any time during the existence of the present rebellion, shall be a defence in all courts to any action or prosecution, civil or criminal, pending or to be commenced, for any search, seizure, arrest, or imprisonment made, done, or committed, or acts omitted to be done, under and by virtue of such order, or under color of any law of Congress, and such defence may be made by special plea, or under the general issue."

ANOTHER horrible accident on a Hudson River steamer makes it plain that something must be done to protect human life on rivers and railroads. And we can think of no remedy better than a modification of a police regulation which prevails, we believe, in Russia, under which, if an injury is inflicted on anybody by a vehicle in motion, no excuse is asked for or accepted from the driver or owner; he has to pay a fine as a matter of course. Now, what we want here is a mandatory law, compelling the attorney-general or district-attorney either of the State or of the United States to enter up judgment for a certain sum against any steamboat company or railroad company in whose vessel or on whose line a life is lost or injury sustained, and no discretion should be left to anybody as to the enforcement of the penalty. We shall give some reasons in our next for believing that this power can be and ought to be entrusted to the general Government.

THE New York Times publishes a letter from Mr. Edwin James to "a member of the British Cabinet" on the Alabama outrages, as something "well worthy of insertion." This is a very amusing waste of space. A letter from the Count Joannes to a member of the Austrian Camarilla, recommending the evacuation of Venice, would be about as important. What does Stephen H. Branch think about it?

SIR MORTON PETO and his friends are probably the first men who have ever had the term of "capitalist" applied to them as a kind of professional title. Wherever they have gone through the country they have been known by it, as if the possession of capital was a calling people could enter at pleasure, which it unfortunately is not. It would doubtless horrify the Westerners whom Mr. Greeley and the scarcity of money have taught to consider usury as a crime next in rank to theft or burglary, to know that there is not one of the "capitalists" who has the least hesitation in taking as much interest for his money as he can get anybody to give him.

WE are as a people proverbially restless, with whom, as with Milton's shepherd, it is ever "to-morrow to fresh woods and pastures new." Hitherto the courses of migration have been tolerably definite and mainly from east to west. To-day they lead in all directions, including the long debarring South. In Indiana there is a movement towards Missouri amongst the better portion of its population, but this exodus is more than balanced, numerically, by the influx from over the river. We do not refer now to the negroes enabled to remove by General Palmer's passes, but to the whites. There has always been a kind of endosmosis between the States which border on the Ohio, and the flow northward seems now to be renewed with an activity proportioned to the counter-current excited by the abolition of slavery. The exchange is not relished by the citizens of Indiana, and we notice an appeal from the Germans for encouragement of European immigration.

THE World urges as much haste as possible in the reconstruction business, so that we may be ready next winter for a war with England, and it considers the Democratic party just the men to be charged with the conduct of these hostilities. It says also that the South is as much enraged with England as we are, and if reconstruction be consummated in December, will lend a helping hand. Of course it will, and we could not in common decency decline the services of such men as Lee, Johnston, Longstreet, Hood, and Wade Hampton, or refuse them their Confederate rank in our service. Governor Humphreys insinuates a complaint in his message to the Mississippi Legislature that we do not pension the scarred veterans of that State who have been fighting us. This matter might as well be settled next winter also.

ONE of the most curious signs of the times is (Catholic) Archbishop Cullen's advising the Irish to prepare for the cholera by general cleansing and fumigation. Ten or twenty years ago the same prelate would have scorned to recommend reliance on such ignoble, because carnal, means of safety, and would have counselled resort to prayer and penance. But science begins to tell even on him.

THERE are now two great loans about to be put on the market; one is that of the "Irish Republic," and the other that of the Mexican Republic. The Irish propose, we believe, to place no limit to their borrowing, but will supply well engraved bonds, neatly and tastefully illustrated, to as many careful investors as choose to apply and pay for them. The Mexicans ask for thirty millions, and offer as security an enormous quantity of lands not now in possession of the republic, and sixty per cent. of customs duties which are at present levied by his Imperial Majesty Maximilian. The bonds are to bear seven per cent. interest in gold, and are recommended by John W. Corlies & Co. to various classes of persons, amongst others to those "who are desirous of holding them simply as an investment." Business is business, and while wishing the Mexican Republic a speedy release from its present troubles, we would advise those to whom it is of importance to have the interest on their capital regularly paid to avoid making advances to either of these borrowers, until the United States have signified their intention of setting them up in business.

GENERAL IMBODEN, late of the Confederate service, is now in New York, raising funds for the establishment of a great express company in the South. When he last appeared in print during the war, he was proposing to strew Western Virginia with "vandal carcases," meaning the bodies of Unionists. When one reads some of the speeches of the Southern chiefs during the war, one wonders how they are not ashamed to sit at tables, eat bread-and-butter, and do the ordinary work of life like the rest of us. Mr. Toombs, of Georgia, solemnly promised on paper, only a year ago, to sacrifice himself when "all was lost," but is still alive and, we presume, in good health. Jefferson Davis, too, pledged himself under his own hand, in 1860, that if war broke out, a "small mound on the borders of his State would show where he and some of his neighbors met the enemy." The "mound," we will wager, is not visible, and he apparently means to keep out of it as long as he can.

THAT portion of Gov. Humphreys' inaugural address to the Mississippi Legislature which we quoted last week, proves, now that the entire document has reached the North, to have been an "elegant extract," by no means to be taken as a sample of what was left unreported. Thus the late rebel general, having announced that "to work is the law of God," with special reference to the negro, proceeds to point out the necessity of compelling him to choose some employment, and if that be in cultivating the great Southern staples, which require continuous labor from the beginning to the end of the year, to stick to it uninterruptedly. But then, "if he attempts to escape, he should be returned to his employer, and forced to work until the time for which he has contracted has expired." This is the odor of slavery still hanging about the shattered vase of Southern society. The martial governor also trusts "that the lessons taught by the rebellion will not be lost either to the North or the South—that freemen, once enlightened, will not submit to wrong or injustice—that sectional aggression will meet with sectional resistance—and that the price of political perfidy is blood and carnage." Evidently here is a pupil who needs to be put to school again; but instead, he receives a diploma of promotion from the President's own hands. It seems to us that the inference of The South, a disloyal sheet now published in New Orleans, is fully justified in this instance. After recalling Gen. Humphreys' consistent support of the rebellion, and the influence which this had in diminishing the vote which made him governor, by reason of his supposed ineligibility, The South says:

"Andrew Johnson appreciates such men as Gen. Humphreys. He knows that such men are the best reconstructionists. They have influence with the people. And so, Andrew Johnson immediately telegraphed to Gov. Sharkey that the governor elect was pardoned and made eligible."

What follows, in the opinion of this same newspaper? Why, that the President wants "no milk-and-water men sent to Washington," but "prefers men who truly represent the interests, the affections, the sympathies, of the great body of the Southern people." These, too, "the Democratic party at the North will open its big arms to receive." There is only one more striking commentary on the President's policy which the week has afforded; and that is the election of Wade Hampton to the governorship of South Carolina. For we shall not except the sanguine Perry's dictum, by which he seeks to hasten the election of representatives:

"Should those elected be in Washington with their credentials when the clerk calls the roll, they cannot be excluded more than those from Massachusetts. No man in South Carolina can take the test oath without perjury. It is not the policy of the President to enforce this, and I believe that it is not the policy of Congress."

And the following telegram, which covers the case of about thirty-four members elect of the Georgia Convention, is likewise of secondary importance:

WASHINGTON, October 18, 1865.

GOVERNOR J. JOHNSON: Your letter of the 7th was received. Send a list of the members elected to the convention in order that pardons may be issued and the amnesty oath may be obtained by the members.

W. HUNTER, Acting Secretary.

"IF Lee is fit to be president of a college," said Wendell Phillips in his speech at the Cooper Institute last week, "then for heaven's sake pardon Wirtz and make him professor of what the Scotch call 'the humanities.'" It is indeed most discreditable that the responsibility of Gen. Lee for the systematic starvation and maltreatment of Union prisoners in Southern keeping should ever be overlooked in an estimate of his character. That he has submitted quietly to Northern supremacy is not more astonishing nor praiseworthy than that he should know when he was beaten by Grant. His acceptance of the presidency of a college cannot be applauded as if he had merely assumed the direction of a railroad; for he undertakes to teach what he does not know, and must be conscious he does not know.

BY proclamation of the President, the first Thursday of December is appointed a day of national thanksgiving.

THE latest theory of New England's advocacy of negro suffrage is that of Gen. Frank P. Blair, at Rolla, Missouri. In his own ever elegant language:

"New England has had a very good time during this war with high tariffs. They laid the tariff on us, while the manufacturers of New England have been coining the money. They do not want the South to come back in the shape of white men, who have always been against the protective system, but they want them to come back with these negroes under the guidance of these New England men, so that they can maintain their political possession of the Government of the United States, and also that they may be able to pass these tariff laws, which make us of the West the 'hewers of wood and the drawers of water' for these lords of the loom. These Yankees, my friends, there is one thing peculiar about them, they have always got an eye to the main chance. [Laughter.] They will talk very prettily—fine sentiments—very pious, and all that sort of thing; but they never forget—it is a religious duty with them never to forget—an eye to the main chance. They are now rolling in wealth, at a period of time when we in the West have been suffering from every sort of distress. They are rolling in wealth throughout New England, which has been amassed during this war, and they want the privilege of continuing that same aggrandizement by obtaining political power. Their principal men want the negro to be made a voter in the South, because they think New England will control the vote of the negro, and so their ambitious men are striving to accomplish their object by declaring that the negroes are the only loyal men in the South, and therefore should be allowed to vote, while the white men, who are all rebels, should be deprived of the right."

It will scarcely be believed that this reasoning was suggested to the orator by an allusion to the Connecticut election, with which, nevertheless, he prefaced it. Nor can it be claimed, in this instance, that the exception proves the rule; for where, if not in Connecticut, shall we find the typical Yankee—the man of thrift and of psalms—who annoyed the burghers of Manhattan with the odor of his Wethersfield onions, and cheated the South with his wooden clocks and wooden nutmegs? where else in New England are there manufactures, and by consequence manufacturers "rolling in wealth?" If the citizens of this State forget for a moment "the main chance" and pecuniary "aggrandizement," the general may as well abandon his theory. He would build more safely on such facts as the recent admission of a young colored man to Harvard College, and his winning the second prize for declamation against the competition of his classmates; or the promotion of a colored lad at the Phillips Academy, Exeter, N. H., above two Kentucky applicants at the same examination, who were mortified into leaving the institution on that account.

One of the results of the late teachers' meeting at Harrisburg was the forming of a national association of school superintendents, with Mr. B. G. Northrop, of Massachusetts, at its head, and Mr. L. Van Bokkelen, of Maryland, secretary. The gentlemen who are thus united together will assemble for the first time in Washington, on the 6th of February next, in the Old Theatre, or Campbell Hospital, on Seventh Street. What is to be the scope and what the influence of their action may be learned from their programme, which embraces a paper by Major-General Howard; another by Hon. Chas. R. Coburn, State Superintendent of Pennsylvania, on school statistics—their value, the points of enquiry, and the mode of obtaining them; a third by the secretary, on the practicability of greater uniformity in the school systems of the different States; a fourth by Hon. E. E. White, State Superintendent of Ohio, on a national bureau of education; a fifth by Hon. J. White, secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Education, on free schools as an essential part of each State school system. With these topics there will also come up for discussion the cost per capita of education in the different States; the leading features of a model State school system; and the greatest defect of prevailing systems.

Among the opinions expressed to Gen. Howard in his passage through North Carolina, by well-informed persons, was one that public sentiment was less disposed now to grant the negro his rights than several months ago. The reasons alleged were the moderated tone and demands of the Federal Government, the restoration to wealth of leading rebels by pardon, and the result of the Connecticut election. Gen. Howard left Charleston for Columbia on the 20th ult. Two days previous, he attended an extra meeting of the city council, which had been called by Mayor Macbeth. The general, besides his customary explanation of the objects of the Freedmen's Bureau, alluded to the hostile feeling of the community towards it, which he deprecated. So long as the atrocities committed upon the blacks were continued, and the testimony of the victims was excluded from the courts, the Bureau would remain to protect them, and the President would be very chary of surrendering the State to civil law. The mayor frankly avowed his own opposition to the Bureau, as an impracticable interloper, and reported a great diversity in the treatment of the blacks by Union officers, according to their political opinions. This occasioned great demoralization among the plantation hands.

Col. Osborne is making a thorough inspection of freedmen's affairs in Florida, in company with Gen. Foster.

Col. Thomas writes from Mississippi that he is confident there will be more suffering this winter among the white than the black poor. The former refuse to be aided in planning for the future, but are content to be fed by Government, and live in idleness. Nearly 10,000 acres in the State are being worked exclusively by freedmen on their own account, the profits, like the business management, falling solely to them. At Davis Bend, the families are organized into a laboring community, with an allotted portion of land for each. They have established courts for themselves, choosing the officers at large, and the decisions of the judge have been carried into effect by the superintendent of the colony. "The plan has worked well, and the people take great interest in their elections, choose their best men, and have recently elected a school-board to serve for six months." Their industry has been stimulated by their own ambition, "without the control of white men or threat of punishment." Physicians who practise among them receive their pay as among whites. The shop-keepers are colored. The Government rations are being repaid by crops. Camps De Soto and Hawley resemble this colony in their principal features, but are not so well regulated. Among them all there is a large number of aged, orphan, and infirm. The colonists "will all have money at the end of the year, and some as high as four or five thousand dollars." The freedmen are also carrying on wood-yards at Davis Bend, Paw Paw Island, and Islands 98 and 110, for the supply of steamboats on the Mississippi. The farms are taxed by the assistant commissioner for the support of hospitals, orphan asylums, physicians, schools, etc. During the summer the schools have been closed, except a few small ones which are private enterprises, but which number, in the various cities, 585 pupils. Three orphan asylums in the State contain 226 inmates, and are in no way dependent on Government.

Gen. Fullerton has relieved Mr. Conway as assistant commissioner for Louisiana, and will perform the duties of the office until the arrival of Gen. Baird.

There are two industrial schools in the District of Columbia which are self-supporting and making money. Two more are soon to be started. The intelligence office continues to furnish employment, averaging six persons daily.

—Mr. Reuben Tomlinson, of Philadelphia, has been appointed to the office of Superintendent of Education for the State of South Carolina. A more judicious selection could not have been made.

The New Orleans Tribune publishes "the Constitution of the First United States Colored Pioneer Association," drawn up by a late member of the 45th United States Colored Infantry, whose service in Texas has made him acquainted with the physical advantages of the lower valley of the Rio Grande. The association is designed to choose a suitable location for a colony, and to promote emigration thither. A military organization for self-defence is provided for. The region indicated produces two crops a year, embracing corn, sugar-cane, cotton, rice, tobacco, all garden vegetables, and the tropical fruits. Stock-raising may be carried on most profitably. Land is worth from twenty-five to a hundred cents per acre. So says Mr. S. H. Smothers, whose home is at Spartanburg, Randolph County, Indiana.

An independent, self-supporting colored school has been in operation in Memphis for the past five months. There is a day-session of six hours, and a night-session of three, with an average attendance of eighty or ninety pupils, of whom twenty-five are adults. Some of them are white, yet were once slaves. The principal is Rev. W. C. Hubbard, who was the unaided founder of the enterprise.

The barbarism of slavery is not yet extinct. An officer at Griffin, Ga., reports two cases of deliberate murder of colored persons by white, and an instance of torture that befits the darkest record of the late régime. John M. Ingram, a resident of Coweta County, punished a mulatto girl who waited upon him by tying her hands behind her back, drawing them up toward the ceiling by a rope, and then dropping from above on her bent and naked body the resin of burning light-wood; after which he descended, and burnt the parts not reached in this way.

MAXIMILIAN proclaimed to the Mexicans on the 2d of October that Juarez had abandoned the warfare against the empire by quitting the country. The Emperor, therefore, conceives that the clemency hitherto exhibited towards the irregular bands by which opposition has been maintained under a show of authority, has reached its limit, and should now be exchanged for inflexible severity, which is accordingly denounced against all guerrillas and their abettors. The friends of the republic deny the reported flight of its chief. On the 16th of September, Maximilian publicly adopted Augustus Iturbide as his heir to the throne of Mexico.

THE diplomatic correspondence between Earl Russell and Minister Adams has engrossed the discussions of the British press—if discussions they may be called, when the support of the Government seems unanimous. The commission proposed is not of a definite character, and will effect a settlement only so far as it helps to make clear the points in dispute. The Atlantic Telegraph Company has authorized an increase of capital by 160,000 shares of £5 each. On the 10th ult., a meeting was held in the London Tavern of the holders of bonds, stock, and shares of the Southern States of this country, whereon the coupons, interest, or dividends are now in arrears in consequence of the recent war. These debts have no connection with the rebellion, and are of nearly thirty years' standing. They are estimated for South Carolina at £700,000; Missouri, £5,000,000; Tennessee, £800,000; do., guaranteed, £3,300,000; North Carolina, £1,800,000; Georgia, £600,000; Virginia, £11,200,000; Louisiana, £1,100,000. £2,000,000 more will represents the debt of the cities, counties, railroads, banks, and other corporate bodies. The bonds of Mississippi, together with the arrears, now amount to £4,000,000, which sum will also stand for the total of arrears for all the States. Favorable accounts of the resources of the South, especially when developed by free labor, were given to the meeting, and a committee was appointed to confer with the State governors and treasurers, and ascertain how they intend to satisfy these claims. The troubles in Ireland still elicit odious comparisons from the continental countries. The Journal des Débats likens English encouragement of rebellion in America to America's encouragement of rebellion in Great Britain, and calls it "Fenianism versus Fenianism," but adds:

"There is, however, this difference, which it is well to note: that the very extravagance of the projects of the Irish conspirators forbids the admission that they have obtained in America the support of any sober man, while it was amongst the highest personages in English society that the secessionists appear to have met with the most precious encouragement."

So the Journal of St. Petersburg draws a parallel between Ireland and Poland, which the Times impeaches of course. At the Congress of Berne, one of the propositions broached in the section on hygiene was of an international commission to drain and purify the delta of the Ganges, which is regarded as the nest of the cholera. Messrs. Drouyn de Lhuys and Armand Behic, in a report to the French Emperor, conclude that the epidemic was imported this year into Egypt by pilgrims returning from Mecca and Djeddah. Not only is the cholera alleged to exist every year among the Mussulman caravans which arrive in these cities, but during the present a particular feast of sacrifices was the cause of an unusual congregation at Mecca. The consecrated ceremonies were reckoned at 200,000, and the sheep and camels slaughtered, of which the offal was left on the ground, at over a million. The pestilence bred by this corruption is developed on the crowded packets which now compete with the desert as a means of pilgrimage. At Djeddah, therefore, and Suez, the points of departure and arrival, it is desirable to establish international sanitary administrations, appointed after diplomatic conference by the powers interested in averting the Asiatic pest. It has been affirmed and contradicted that the French troops have begun to be withdrawn from Italy.

THE success which has attended the efforts of women to enter the medical profession has been too conspicuous to escape general notice, and, perhaps for this profession more than for any other, especially in the branch of obstetrics, it is difficult to frame an argument for their exclusion. A Miss Elizabeth Garrett, of London, though denied at St. Andrew's College the surgical diploma and degree of M.D. to which her proficiency entitled her, has obtained, after an examination, the customary license which constitutes the legal qualification of a general practitioner. It is reported that she intends to open a course on psychology, exclusively for women, at the Workingmen's College, Queen's Square.

"THE course of true love" runs no smoother for princes than for other men. We see it related that the heir-apparent to the new Italian crown, instead of dutifully falling in love with some eligible lady, has bestowed his young affections where, as Byron says, they must run to waste, or water but the desert. He has even allowed himself to be smitten by the charms of the Princess Marguerite, eldest daughter of the Duke of Nemours, one of Louis Philippe's sons. To this his father objects, because that father's ally and chief supporter—his creator, we may say, as King of Italy—refuses to sanction a marriage that would place a lady belonging to the house of Orléans on the Italian throne. Napoleon III., like a true politician, has no loves and few hatreds; but among the few persons whom he does hate may be placed every member of the Orléans family. He hates them, not because they have injured him, but because he has injured them. This is a sound reason for hatred, and even if he would not plead it, he might bring up a much better reason for hating them. The founder of Orléans royalty spared his life in 1836, after the Strasburg affair, and let him depart in peace on very moderate conditions—which conditions the future Emperor broke through without much hesitation. Louis Philippe might have had him put to death in 1840, after the Boulogne affair, but he contented himself with consenting to his imprisonment. Twice did the first of the second generation of Bonapartes owe his life to the head of the younger branch of the Bourbons. Such generosity is not to be forgiven, and it leaves the Emperor at perfect liberty to hate all the descendants of the kind and magnanimous citizen-king. He did not create a new kingdom between the Alps and the Adriatic that it might afford a home for Orléans princes and princesses, and, perhaps, a base for operations having for their object the restoration of their family to the French throne. But it speaks well for the consideration in which the Orléans family is held, and of the impression that exists in royal minds that it is not destined to remain in exile, that the King of Italy is restrained from granting his consent to the marriage of his eldest son and the Princess Marguerite only because of his dependence on the French Emperor. No other fallen royal family ever stood so well in the eighteenth year of its exile. What king would have consented to the marriage of his eldest son to a princess of the Bonaparte family, eighteen years after Waterloo? That there is to be another restoration of the old line to the throne of France is borne in the minds of kings who are not so unlucky as to have lost their business; and they treat the Orléans family well, because they believe in its great expectations. The Comte de Chambord being childless, and his wife getting hard upon the fifties, a restoration of Henri V. would work eventually for the benefit of the younger branch. The Comte de Paris, who is a cousin of the Princess Marguerite, would be heir-presumptive should there ever be a Henri V., King of France and Navarre. The lady's hand is worth having, even if a future king is anxious to have and to hold it.

A FRENCH chemist, M. Emile Duchemin, has invented and put into practical operation a marine electric pile, which promises to be as useful as it is simple. He pierces a disk of cork, which serves as a buoy, with a cylinder of charcoal and zinc, and throws it into the sea. The water acts upon this elemental couple and produces an electric current. Several of these buoys grouped together constitute a battery which may be employed like any other. The latest report of an experiment by the inventor at Fécamp is, that a bell had been kept sounding by his apparatus for fifty-eight days and nights. A number of useful purposes to which this discovery is applicable will readily suggest themselves to every mind. If a bell may be rung on shore, it may on a reef. The coming-in of the tide can be announced by a provision for hoisting a signal. Telegraphing can be carried on between different points of a harbor, and many offices on shipboard might be performed by the constant, self-regulating agency of the floating pile. It has even been suggested that a sufficiently powerful combination might produce the electric light, and so feed every beacon on our coasts.

THE GIST OF THE ALABAMA CONTROVERSY.

As the correspondence between Mr. Adams and Earl Russell, just made public, involves very interesting, and, to a certain extent, new questions, of international law, and will doubtless give rise to much discussion both at home and abroad, we propose to state in a brief manner the facts of the Alabama case, which may be regarded as a type of all others, and the simple issues raised between our representative at the Court of St. James and the British Government, stripped of all adventitious and extraneous matter. Into the merits of the controversy we cannot now enter. The voluminous despatches of the State Department and the elaborate dissertations of the English secretary and American ambassador, able as they are, do not exhaust this fruitful subject.

That the Alabama was constructed at Liverpool, by British builders, as a man-of-war for the Confederate States; that she there took on her outfit and most of her men and officers; that she left her moorings and dropped about forty miles down to Moelfra Bay, where she anchored and shipped the rest of her crew and materials for gun-carriages; that she thence proceeded to the Azores, and was met by a British vessel, sailing from a British port, having on board her guns and a few of her officers; that these guns and men were transferred to her under the British flag; that thenceforth Captain Semmes took command and raised the rebel colors; that she set forth on her work of destruction, and was subsequently received into British ports and treated as an armed public vesssel of a friendly power, until she met the Kearsarge, and was sunk—these are facts undisputed; they have passed into the history of the times.

In respect to the manner of her escape, there is some discrepancy in the accounts. These differences, however, are only in matters of detail; they are not substantial.

The Alabama, then called No. 290, was built in 1862. Mr. Adams had, from time to time, communicated evidence respecting her character and designs to the British Government. The law officers of the Crown pronounced this evidence not sufficient to warrant any steps being taken to arrest her. They seemed to require such proofs as would secure a conviction before a jury, and would not act upon any suspicions or presumptions. It may be remarked, in passing, that it nowhere appears that the British Government itself took any active measures to ascertain the status of this or any other Confederate vessel. The labor of collecting evidence to satisfy their own consciences or judgments they seem to have left to the American minister and his agents. All their movements seem to have been caused by an impulse from the American embassy; none were voluntary. At last, on the 22d of July, 1862, Mr. Adams laid before the British Government such proofs as were deemed by the law officers irresistible. Earl Russell and the Attorney-General state that the legal opinion to this effect was received by the administration on the 29th of July; that telegraphic despatches ordering the steamer to be seized were sent to Liverpool on that day, but on the very same day she escaped by stratagem. On the 1st of August messages were transmitted to ports in Ireland and to Nassau to detain her on her arrival. The collector of customs for Liverpool, on the other hand, states in a public, official letter that the telegram was received on the 31st, and that the gunboat had left before its reception. A "History of the Cruise of the Alabama," written by an officer on board, gives other particulars. Secret information having been communicated to the rebel agents that the order of arrest was to be issued, the steamer started on the morning of the 29th, as if on a trial trip, proceeded to Moelfra Bay, forty miles distant, anchored and remained there, shipping hands and material until the afternoon of the 31st. Finally, to bring home these facts to a responsible officer of the Government, the American consul at Liverpool, on the 30th, informed the same collector of the position of the missing vessel and of all her proceedings since she departed under false pretences. No steps were taken to arrest her.

We arrive, then, at the following conclusions, all founded upon British testimony, most of it of a high official character: The Government waited seven days after receiving information acknowledged sufficient before they moved at all. If the despatch was sent on the 29th, the collector at Liverpool wilfully neglected for two days to take any steps to seize the offending steamer, which he knew was anchored a few miles off, engaged in an unlawful enterprise, and in constant communication with the shore. If the despatch was not sent until the 31st, then there was a delay of two days on the part of the Government, after they had determined to act. These two days, during which either the cabinet or the subordinate were temporizing, caused the virtual destruction of the foreign commerce of the United States, or its tranfer to British bottoms.

On this state of facts the United States maintain that the British Government is bound, in honor and good faith, and by the principles of international law, to make compensation to American citizens whose property was destroyed by this Confederate cruiser, and proposes to submit the claim to arbitration. Great Britain denies the liability, and rejects the proposition to arbitrate.

What are the issues involved in this demand and refusal? In the first place, the United States do not rest their claim upon any interpretation of a British statute. Such a statute does exist, which provides that if any subject shall equip, furnish, fit out, or arm, or endeavor, procure, or aid in equipping a vessel with the intent that the same shall be used by one belligerent against another power with whom Great Britain is at peace, such act shall be a misdemeanor, and the vessel shall be forfeited. In the Alexandra case the English courts put such a construction upon this statute as rendered it virtually inoperative. With this decision, by the properly constituted tribunals, upon a point of the municipal law, it is conceded the United States must be content. The internal national jurisprudence is a matter entirely within the province of the national judiciary. Were this statute, therefore, the ground of our claim, the assertion of Earl Russell, that the "law officers of the crown were to be assumed the best interpreters of their own legislation," would be undeniable.

But the United States insist that beyond this or any other statute, and even in the absence of any positive act of parliament, the established principles of international law require that every neutral shall use all possible methods, all reasonable diligence, to prevent its own citizens from fitting out armed vessels to prey upon the commerce of a belligerent with whom it is at peace, and that it makes no difference whether the armed vessels are privateers or public men-of-war of one of the contending powers. They further insist that if such armed vessel is sent forth by the citizens of a neutral state, in fraud of their obligations of neutrality, even without any fault on the part of the government, that government is bound to seize her should she return to its ports, and to take possession of and restore to their owners any prizes which she may send into the neutral jurisdiction. The United States also insist that if the neutral government has been guilty of negligence in using measures to prevent the escape of such armed vessel, then it is chargeable with the further duty of making reparation to the individuals whose property has been taken or destroyed by the cruiser. It should be noticed that this latter claim depends, in fact, upon two elements, the negligence of the neutral authorities, and the rules of the public law growing out of such negligence. It is nowhere asserted that the mere fact of a mere surreptitious equipment and escape of a hostile cruiser entails the duty of reparation for losses upon the neutral power.

The issue, therefore, between the United States and Great Britain resolves itself into two simple questions, the one of fact, the other of law. The first, were the British authorities culpably negligent in taking measures to detain the Alabama? The second, granting such negligence, does the international law throw upon them the duty of making compensation to American citizens?

Such being the character of the issue, it is evident that if any case should ever be referred to arbitration, this should be. It would be imposing too much upon human nature to call upon Earl Russell, Sir Roundell Palmer, and other members of the ministry to acknowledge solemnly their own shortcomings, to concede their negligence in reference to the Alabama and other rebel cruisers. It would be asking the very defendants to adjudge themselves guilty. We can also easily understand their unwillingness to permit any other persons to sit in judgment upon their acts. But if Lord Russell's declaration, that "Her Majesty's Government are the sole guardians of their own honor," is to be taken as the announcement of a rule of international law, applicable to all similar cases, then the method of settling national disputes by arbitration may be considered as henceforth virtually abandoned. Every such submission has involved, and must involve, an enquiry into the acts of governmental officials, and we cannot see that the rank or grade of the functionary implicated should distinguish one case from another. We repeat, then, that this dispute is peculiarly one which should be decided by arbitrators. The question of fact depends upon many circumstances, some of them trivial, but, all combined, tending to throw great doubt upon the good faith or earnestness of Her Majesty's ministers. The question of law is new, and of the highest importance to all the maritime powers of the world.

We believe, too, that whatever may have been the prevailing sentiment a year or two ago, there is hardly a man of intelligence or education in England who is not conscious that the cabinet has committed a number of deplorable blunders—deplorable, if for no other reason, for the effect they produced on the public mind in this country, in their manner of dealing with the rebellion. There has hardly been a step they have taken, from the proclamation of neutrality down to the withdrawal of belligerent rights this summer, which has not worn an air of hostility to this Government, or which has not been capable of a hostile interpretation. They maintain that they have been misunderstood, and hold up their hands in aggrieved wonder over American irritability. Now, there could not be a better way of allaying this irritation and justifying their own course, if it be capable of justification, than submitting it to the candid and impartial judgment of a disinterested third party. If the complaints of Americans be really due, as Earl Russell would have the world believe, to excitability, prejudice, and wrong-headedness, he has of course nothing to fear from having the grounds of them examined by an impartial bystander. If our charges are by such a tribunal pronounced untenable, we must, of course, for ever after hold our peace. If they are sustained, Earl Russell will hardly maintain that English "honor" calls for a persistent denial of what unprejudiced opinion pronounces to be justice. And he will certainly incur a weighty responsibility, both in the eyes of this and all future generations, if he deliberately refuses to sanction, on an occasion so great and solemn as this is, the adoption by the two greatest nations of the world of the only civilized and Christian mode of settling disputes, and, in obedience to the dictates of barbarous pride, leaves us to the most barbarous of all remedies.

RECONSTRUCTION THROUGH BANKRUPTCY.

It is a misnomer to call Congressmen and Parliament-men "law-makers." They make nothing of the kind. At best, they do but discover and state laws. Oftenest, they mistake them and state them wrong. Their efforts are but tentative and empirical, feeling after the ordinances of the only Lawgiver, if, haply, they may find them. They often try to repeal those ordinances and to set up their own devices in their stead; but are always brought to an open shame. The laws which the Creator has impressed upon physical nature, and human nature, and upon the course of human affairs—or the dealings of men with men in nature—may be discovered and announced, but it is no use trying to tamper with them. All this sounds as self-evident as Squire Thornhill's postulate in his discussion with Moses Primrose that "whatever is, is!" And yet how much of the legislating of the world since civil government was established has been ingeniously devised to organize injustice and cruelty and folly into law! We will not put our sermon over into our neighbors' pews, and speak of class legislation, artificial distinction of ranks, entails, primogeniture, and other attempts in the old world to build up a state in defiance of eternal laws. Our own endeavor to incorporate an injustice so black as to make all other national wickednesses look fair with our constitution of government, and to uphold it by laws and schemes of policy, forbid us to throw any stones at the window-panes of our neighbors over the water. Nobody will deny now that we made a signal failure of it, that the corner-stone of our republican institutions has been removed in spite of us, that a great part of the edifice has tumbled into ruin, and that we have now to set to work to reconstruct it as best we may.

It is to be hoped that the present Congress will profit by the blunders of its predecessors, and do its work in a workmanlike fashion, so that it will not have to be done over again. One would think that we had paid dearly enough for our attempts to reverse the laws of moral gravitation, and to make our pyramid stand upon its apex, to make us willing to try to set it, now that we have to build it over again, upon its broad base, instead. Of course, no enduring construction can be reared on any other foundation than that of equal justice to all the people. None other can stand, and any attempt to build it up on rotten compromises and cruel prejudices will be as futile as infamous. Any such must come to grief, and we with it. Eternal law will triumph, and right be finally done, in spite of presidents and congresses, should they set their faces against them like flints. But much suffering and loss and vexation may be avoided by a wise adaptation of the national action to the demands of justice and a wise expediency now, instead of waiting for another bloody lesson. Congress cannot stop the action of the laws of political justice and political economy, though it may disturb their normal workings and so hinder the blessings they were ordained to secure from flowing to the returning rebels—at least, as soon as they naturally would.

It is through the operation of these laws that the South must be reconstructed, whether it like it or not, and whether or not it be helped or hindered by the nation. The effect may be different from what the Southern people desire and may attempt to bring about, but it is none the less inevitable. The present race of Southerners must virtually reconstruct their institutions for themselves, by conforming to the laws of political justice and political economy, which are inseparable if not identical, or else be swept out of existence by them. And Congress can do little more than to try to hold their hands from hurting themselves until they come to "a realizing sense" of their condition. There never was so thorough, utter, all-pervading a revolution as that which the slaveholders' rebellion has worked in the social and political condition of the South. For revolutions in general have left the laboring classes just about where they found them, and the changes gained or sought touched only the rights and relations of a comparatively small proportion of the population. But this revolution enters every kitchen, every garret, every workshop, and every field, as well as every court-house and capitol. It is, indeed, a radical revolution, for it reaches to the very roots of society as well as to all its ramifications. Now the roots of a tree are the fountains of its life. The branches of an evil tree may be lopped off, and, if the root be sound, a good tree may be grafted upon it which shall bring forth good fruit and its leaves be for the healing of the nations. But if the root die it shall altogether perish.

Now, the root of every human polity is the laboring class, from which it derives its nourishment and its strength; and its true prosperity and power are in just proportion to the moral and physical well-being of that class. The revolution from which we are not yet extricated has completely changed the former relations of laborers and employers in all the rebel country, and it is for the latter to say whether they will, and can, so re-arrange those relations as to be mutually beneficial, or whether they shall go to the wall. The essential element of the old state of things in the South, swept away by the storm of war, was the purchasable quality of the negro. This was the corner-stone of their republican institutions, and now that it is knocked away, the old edifice must come down, to be replaced by one of fairer and safer proportions. Mr. Wendell Phillips, in his recent lecture entitled "The South Victorious," speaks of the abolition of chattelism as a fact of small moment, which may not necessarily make any material difference in the future of the negro. We submit that this is one of the paradoxes by which that brilliant but inexact and illogical speaker delights to startle his audiences. We hold that it is the one all-controlling fact that the war has established—the fact that is to give color and direction to all the history that is to grow out of the war. It was the purchasable quality of the negro that gave to the slaveholding States the imperfect measure of prosperity that they ever had to boast of. It represented their reserved capital, which could be realized at any moment. A slave, from the moment he was born, had a positive market value. His blood might literally be coined to drachmas whenever its conversion into ready money became desirable. He was his master's savings bank, in which he laid away his spare stealings—for we cannot justly call them "earnings." Now the ruthless hand of war has broken all these banks and swept away all that gold locked up in human brains and sinews. In the old time, when the planter needed capital, he could always sell a portion of his human live stock, and as to the Border States, it was by the craft of making and selling these ebony images of God that they got their wealth—such as it was. It was the purchasable quality of the negro that gave to the slaveholding States the absolute command of labor by which they lived. That quality is now extinguished for ever, and with it the old state of things has passed away, and it is not in the hand of man to bring it back again.

We know that many of the present generation at the South will resist the irresistible, and strive to regain the irrecoverable. This can but happen. They know of no other way of winning bread or gathering wealth than by the compulsory labor of "sinews bought and sold." They will endeavor, if the nation permit it, to contrive some method of compelling the blacks to work without satisfactory wages. But the power of purchasing men in market overt being gone, and with it the command of capital, all such attempts must come to naught in the long run, and, generally, in the short run. They must either bring their minds to make it worth the while of the negroes to work on their land, or they must make them up to sell their land to men who can. Diva Pecunia, the goddess money, is the divinity that shapes the ends of mod ern society. It may be a pity, but it is true. Capital is the life-blood of production, and of this the body politic of the slave States is drained. The national sword has emptied its veins of four thousand millions of cash value. Capital must either be created anew by cheerful and well-paid labor, or it must be transfused from without. We read of combinations of planters not to sell their lands to Yankees! Combinations to prevent water from running down hill! We read of threats to kill all the negroes or to drive them out of the country. Four million threatened men, we may be sure, will live long and will stay where they choose. There will be enough of oppression, and cruelty, and wrong, and injustice in the process, and all the more if the nation withdraws its tutelage of the spendthrift South too soon, but the necessity of the case must compel the present race at the South to work themselves, and to make it worth the while of the blacks to work, or they must give way to a peaceful incursion of Northern hordes that will bring civilization, and prosperity, and Christianity in their train. It is in vain to kick against the pricks. This last will probably be the ultimate solution of this vexed question. The laws of political economy have always been fighting against slavery. They have now compelled it to surrender, and they will not suffer their victory to be a barren one. The stars in their courses did not fight more potentially against Sisera than those divine laws have fought against slavery and will fight against all its works. Wise or wicked action on the part of the nation may shorten or delay their blessed influences, but they must and will mightily prevail. If there be not a reconstruction of Southern society through its repentance and voluntary return to obedience to those divine laws, there certainly will follow, and in no long time, its reconstruction through bankruptcy.

OUR CONSULS IN CHINA AND ELSEWHERE.

THERE is an ethic fiction embodying the idea that no gentleman will insult you and no blackguard can, with which affronted philosophers attempt to console themselves, but we doubt if the comfort they draw from it is much greater than the slender satisfaction to be derived from letting a thief prove himself such by stealing out of your company. It is certain that in the political intercourse of nations, dignified indifference to contumely is not to be thought of, and that the only course is to resent and punish it at once, showing a just regard for the cause of universal good manners by teaching a barbarous power, if the insult comes from it, the value of international sincerity and courtesy, with a severity adapted to barbarous thickness of skull and skin. A duty of this nature has fallen upon us recently through the breach of treaty committed by China in refusing to surrender to the American Consul at Shanghai the person of Burgevine, a desperado well-known in connection with the Chinese rebellion, who was recently taken by the Imperialists, and who, in defiance of our Consul's protest, has been sent for trial into the interior of the Empire. If the English correspondents who write these facts are right in their conjectures, Burgevine has probably been starved to death before this, or has been executed by the Chinese authorities. The question, therefore, is not of Burgevine, but of national self-respect. Even if Burgevine were alive, Christianity and civilization would be but slightly served by his safety, and it is only in Burgevine as an idea that we can be reasonably interested.

It is known that in most countries of other than Christian faith consuls have certain extraordinary powers, including jurisdiction of criminal offences committed by their countrymen, and there is a clause of our treaty with China under which the American Consul felt himself bound to demand the surrender of Burgevine for trial in the consular court. But the Chinese authorities would not give up their prisoner, and have made no reply to the Consul's protest, in which he hinted that when the American fleet arrived in Chinese waters the affront offered us in this breach of the faith of treaties would not be forgotten. The affair, therefore, remains for our naval squadron to arrange, and it will no doubt be promptly and effectually settled. It is questionable, indeed, whether the Chinese government would have shown us this disrespect if we had maintained a naval force on their coast, and their contempt has fallen on us partly through fault of our own.

It seems that the Chinese have come to hold us in slight esteem because our consuls in their ports have been chosen from the mercantile class, or from among the missionaries resident there. The Chinese have a noble scorn for both traders and priests, and this scorn has not always been abated by the persons chosen for office, for they have seldom sunk the shop in assuming the consular dignity; the merchants have continued in trade and the missionaries have occasionally sought to say a few words on the atonement during their interviews with the Chinese officials. This is the account given by the correspondents of the English press, and though there is some malicious exaggeration and some unintentional error in it, there is still enough truth to make it mortifying to our pride and injurious to our interests.

Sooner or later our people must learn that we can have no perfect consular representation except as the English and French have, through men educated specially for their positions, paid salaries sufficient to lift them above dependence upon any other avocation, and continued in office during good behavior. We believe that our administrations have long felt the necessity of such representation, and there has been effort made to establish it as a system, though this effort has been permitted, by the ignorance and stupidity of congresses, to be only a half-success hardly less discouraging than defeat. In 1856 our consular anarchy underwent a complete revision and a slight improvement. The necessity of lodging consular functions in persons forbidden to trade was acknowledged by a clause forbidding commerce to all consuls receiving salaries above a certain amount; but this amount was made so small that none but a rich man able to live without salary, or a rogue determined to trade in violation of his bond, or a scholar with some cherished purpose of study to be fulfilled abroad, and willing to live poorly for the sake of it, could afford to accept the office. In the wisdom of our legislators a thousand dollars a year were believed sufficient to maintain in the proper dignity, and above the necessities of trade, a commercial representative in places where the French and English consuls were paid four and five times as much; and it was thought desirable that he should remain subject, as before, to removal by the first President of opposite politics who should be elected after his appointment. The manner in which we were represented under the administration of Mr. Buchanan was comment enough upon the improvements made in our consular system; and when Mr. Lincoln took his place, the necessity of some change was felt. The new head of the State Department had doubtless seen much of the evils of low-salaried consular representation abroad, and an effort was made to obtain better pay for the consuls who should be sent out to replace Mr. Buchanan's employees. This effort succeeded, and additional salary was allowed to consuls of such ports as the State Department should determine, as compensation for possible increase of duty during the war, the additional pay to cease with the hostilities then existing. Under the law of Congress authorizing this additional salary, the income of several consulates was raised from $1,000 to $1,500, but in no case, we believe, increased to $2,000. Still, this was a great amelioration, and the efficiency of our consular service during the past four years witnesses the wisdom of the Government's liberality. Encouraged, doubtless, by the success of this effort, and the good results attending its success, its friends broached a project tending to make the consular representation permanent in adequate persons, and a bill was introduced into Congress for the appointment of consular pupils to be attached to the more important consulates, and educated in the duties of those stations. The proposed number of pupils was cut down from twenty-four to twelve, and the bill has become a law under which these consular attachés may be appointed with a compensation not exceeding $1,000 a year. They are intended, of course, to rise to the consular grade, which it is to be presumed their education will enable them to hold with credit to themselves and honor to the nation; and the sagacity of our legislation is nobly illustrated by the fact that as long as these young men remain pupils they are secure in their places, but as soon as they become consuls they may be removed by the fortunes of the next Presidential election. They shall be well paid to learn how to be consuls, and they shall be turned out when they know how, to make room for the new man who knows nothing of the duties of the post, but who is eminently qualified for it by services rendered in the political canvass.

In fine, our consular system remains nearly as it was before. It is not a career for any man ambitious of distinction and usefulness, and it is not a support for those willing to go into exile for a livelihood. Under these encouraging circumstances, the consulates will continue to be filled, as heretofore, by merchants who can make the office pay them in a business way, or by rich men going abroad for pleasure, or by poor ones going abroad for disappointment. The cost of living annually increases throughout the world, but our consuls are kept upon pittances that were beggarly when living was cheap. They go to their posts inexperienced men; and at the time when they have acquired the difficult art of representing the Government handsomely on nothing a year, when they have acquainted themselves thoroughly with their official duties, and have learned the language of the country to which they are sent, they are practically supposed to have outlived their usefulness, and are at any moment in danger of removal. Their fitness cannot save them, as no zeal nor excellence could advance them a step in the service.

Let us punish the Chinese as they deserve for their breach of good faith and good manners; but let us do something to remedy the fault in ourselves which led them to distrust our national greatness. If we wish our consuls to impress the Chinese with an idea of our importance (and it is necessary to do this in order to obtain justice from them), we cannot make consuls of men engaged in trade, nor of missionaries, whose hearts are naturally in a higher work. It is not to be supposed for an instant that the French or English consul in a Chinese port is a merchant or a clergyman. In fact, we must raise our representatives everywhere above necessity by paying them well, and then we shall have an influence through their dignity which will be commensurate with our own, we must make their tenure of office permanent, and must make their service a career in order to induce the right men to enter upon it. We chance, at present, to be represented abroad by fidelity and intelligence, and much of the respect felt for our Government comes through that felt for the personal, not official, character of our functionaries. But this is not enough; it is the office which must be made permanently important to our interests and honor, and not the accident of a good public servant. Our officers in China are able and conscientious men, according to the English journals, but they had no adequate official dignity to support them, and they failed to exact good faith and respect toward us.

THE FREEDOM OF THE PRESS AND THE LAW OF LIBEL.

Among the civic evidences of the superiority of democratic institutions which the future historian of our great rebellion will cite with just pride and satisfaction, the freedom enjoyed by the press during the sanguinary struggle will not be the least either in significance or interest. The few instances where the exigencies of the case demanded and justified interference on the part of the Government, only make the prevalent and permanent toleration more remarkable. Never in the world's history, in a period of intense civil and military conflict, was the utterance of men, oral and printed, less restrained, hampered, or modified by external power. Politicians made or tried to make capital out of the action of the Government when censorship was exercised by the War Office, and treasonable publications suspended; but the fact is indisputable that, considering the magnitude of the conflict, the complexity of the interests and influences at work, and the imminence of the national peril, the freedom of the press was sustained and protected to a degree and in a manner which reflect the highest credit on the candor of the popular mind and the forbearance of those in authority. No student of history, no resident of Europe, can fail to recognize herein a trait and triumph of free government and general education; and future explorers of the documentary history of the war for the Union will read, with complacent astonishment, the bold and emphatic, yet unchecked, expression of opinion in the current literature of the day—the freedom of criticism indulged in as to the administration of the Government, the action of generals in the field, the motives, character, and ability of prominent men while actually engaged in the public service, at a great crisis, and when loyalty and treason worked side by side in social and political life. Not less remarkable is the comparative absence of litigation growing out of this same freedom of comment and criticism. So healthful is public opinion in regard to the necessity and right of free discussion, where any public interest is involved, that there is no encouragement to prosecute unless positive malice can be proved. Our people seemed to have adopted the spirit of Milton's noble essay on unlicensed printing, and to be practically aware that political liberty and free expression are identical, and that every question of importance must be fairly and fully discussed to secure the ends of justice, truth, and progress. There are times when this unrestrained utterance tries the patience and perhaps mars the fortunes of the individual, but its social necessity is none the less acknowledged. It is painful to a generous and just mind to witness, as is so often the case, ignorance, vulgarity, and spite gauging the scope and branding the labors of the scholar, the man of genius, or the disinterested purveyor in the fields of knowledge; to see worth and wisdom profaned by low, narrow ribaldry, and the respectable and respected in the world of letters spattered with mud from the kennels; but all this, it is found by experience, never injures an honest reputation or mars true fame; and, as a nuisance, it is more than compensated by the blessings of free thought and expression in the testing and proclamation of truth and advocacy of right.

It was the opinion of the late Gouverneur Morris that the elemental foundation of American liberties is to be traced to the trial of Peter Zenger, printer of the New York Weekly Journal, for an alleged libel, in 1770, because that event "revealed the philosophy of freedom both of thought and speech;" and ever since it has been the noble distinction of our tribunals, sanctioned by enlightened public opinion, that the acts, the theories, the writings of every citizen shall be freely criticized to the utmost extent of investigation and animadversion—provided that no personal malevolence or violation of private character obtains. This distinction the civil war, with all its temptations to the opposite extreme, and the warrant it afforded for encroaching upon the great principles, has confirmed and renewed; and we repeat, this is one of those results which add to the credit and faith of popular government. Our attention has been called to the subject by a report, which appeared recently in one of the journals, of an argument on a demurrer in the Dawson-Jay libel case by Hon. William M. Evarts. His argument was conclusive to our mind, and stated with clear emphasis as an American legal principle. The case referred to a literary or rather political criticism of a standard work—a criticism altogether devoted to the vindication of national principles against partizan and disloyal ideas—promulgated at the most critical juncture, and deriving importance rather from their association with a work of established fame than from any personal influence of the writer. It was an excellent occasion to vindicate the great cause of the freedom of the press, and to show how essential its legal recognition is to the integrity of our institutions and the health of the body politic. Mr. Evarts stated the principle involved, not merely as a lawyer but as an American statesman. It is significant that in feeling and practice we have reached, on this subject, the scope and spirit of the best English authorities:

"Liberty of criticism must be allowed," charged Lord Ellenborough, "or we should neither have purity of taste nor of morals. Fair discussion is essentially necessary to the truth of history and the advancement of science. That discussion," he adds, "I shall never treat as a libel which has for its object, not to injure the reputation of any individual, but to correct misrepresentation of fact, to refute sophistical reasoning, to expose a vicious taste in literature, or to censure what is hostile to morality."—1 Campbell, 355.

And again: "One writer, in exposing the follies and errors of another, may make use of ridicule, however poignant. Ridicule is often the fittest weapon that can be employed for such a purpose. Every man who publishes a book commits himself to the judgment of the public, and any one may comment upon his performance. If the commentator does not step aside from the work, or introduce fiction for the purpose of condemnation, he exercises a fair and legitimate right; fair and candid criticism every one has a right to publish, although the author may suffer a loss from it; such a loss the law does not consider an injury, because it is a loss which the party ought to sustain; it is but the loss of fame and profit to which he was never entitled. However severe the animadversion may be, the author has no right to complain, unless the private character be maliciously vilified."

In an action for libel upon an author, Lord Kenyon admitted evidence of the nature of the plaintiff's works, and it appearing that they were themselves of a libellous and scandalous description, his lordship threw his parchment at his head, and dismissed him from the court with contempt.

"The main question," said Lord Ellenborough, in a like case, "is quo animo the defendant published the article complained of—whether he meant to put down a nuisance to public morals, or to prejudice the plaintiff. To ascertain this, it is material to know the general nature of the plaintiff's publication to which the libel alludes. The plaintiff is bound to show that the defendant was actuated by malice, and the defendant discharges himself by proving the contrary."

Chancellor Kent recognized the vast practical worth and essential justice of the principles thus laid down—principles, be it remembered, opposed to the then prevailing traditional views in Great Britain, but slowly making their way, while, on various memorable occasions, they had been fully acted upon in this country.

"If the theory of the prevailing doctrine in England," says Kent, "(for even there it is now scarcely anything more than theory), had been strictly put in practice with us, where would have been all those enlightened and manly discussions which prepared and matured the great events of our Revolution, or which, in a more recent period, pointed out the weakness and folly of the Confederation, and roused the nation to throw it aside, and to erect a better government on its ruins? Whatever may be our opinion on the English law, there is another and a very important view of the subject to be taken, and that is with respect to the standard of the American press. In England they have never taken any notice of the press in any parliamentary recognition of the principles of the government, or the right of the subject; whereas, the people of this country have always classed the freedom of the press among their fundamental rights. The liberty of the press consists in the right to publish with impunity truth, with good motives and for justifiable ends, whether it respects government, magistracy, or individuals."

WAR ON THE RIVER PLATE.

THE armies in the field in this war are the largest ever brought into contact in South America, at least since the days of the Incas, and this circumstance has attracted more attention from the public than has usually been given to the chronic state of civil war which has so long reigned there. The general feeling is, both here and in Europe, in favor of the allies, who appear to be acting solely in defense of their invaded rights. A painful feeling has, however, been caused by the apparent cruelty at the late battle of Yatay, where, of three thousand Paraguayans engaged, seventeen hundred were killed. Details of the battle, since at hand, show that this great mortality was caused by the absolute refusal of the Paraguayans to yield. It seems that the allies, under General Flores, numbered eight thousand infantry, with thirty-eight pieces of artillery and a considerable body of cavalry, while the Paraguayans numbered but three thousand infantry, well armed but with little artillery. Their leader, Major Duarte, was captured early in the fight, and the force was soon scattered into small bands, which deliberately shot the bearers of flags of truce coming to beg them to cease a useless struggle, the only answer given to the messengers from Flores being that "we have no orders to surrender." Groups of even twenty men fought to the last, and with so determined a ferocity that it is only surprising so many as twelve hundred men were taken alive. While there is something in this desperate courage which excites sympathy, yet it is clearly a useless sacrifice of life, with an absolute indifference to death which a despotic government seems to have the power to create among its subjects. A similar state of feeling existed among the Russians in their late war. The Paraguayans are mainly of Indian blood, of the Guarani tribe, whose language is still in common use among them, though many speak Spanish indifferently well. The country, early in the history of the Spanish domination, was taken charge of by the Jesuits, and the law of implicit, unquestioning obedience inculcated by them has been preserved to this day, while the submissive character of the tribe to their rulers made it a peculiarly favorable soil in which to plant a despotism and to reap its fruits. The Jesuit rule was followed by the Dictator Francia, famous in history, who has been in turn followed by the Lopezes, father and son, the last being now the ruler. He is of mixed Spanish and Indian blood, and received the government of the country from his father by the last will and testament of the latter, though he rejoices in the title of President, and the country is called a republic.

The Paraguayan army actually in the field comprises nearly every man capable of bearing arms in the country, the officers being mainly European, as are the munitions of war. That Lopez should be wantonly cruel is almost a necessity for a despot who finds his hitherto supreme will now opposed by armed enemies. The bodies of those he has killed in some small engagements, as also of the many he has shot in cold blood, have been thrown into the River Parana, that they might be carried down to distress and irritate the Argentines down the river, at Buenos Ayres, while the state of Corrientes, which he has overrun, has been completely sacked and ruined, the families even being sent into Paraguay, and in every instance parents and children separated, many of them probably never to meet again, the reason given being that it would prevent "combinations to escape."

MORE FICTIONS.

THE President is a very excellent and very able man, and we have no doubt means well in all he is doing at the South; but his conversation with Major Stearns reveals a mental defect which makes us sometimes wish he would follow Lord Mansfield's advice to the country justice, and refrain from giving the reasons for his decisions. The course he is pursuing at the South may be the best; but the arguments by which he justified it to Major Stearns are so very bad, that it is a pity we should ever have heard of them. The practice of inventing and spreading little legal fictions, which has grown up since the war, is not creditable to those who indulge in it, and though many people consider it a powerful political engine, we confess we have too high an opinion of the public intelligence to suppose that it possesses the smallest value, or imposes on anybody whomsoever.

What is the use, for instance, in maintaining so stoutly that the revolted States were not and are not out of the Union, and could not get out? Who is deceived by this most transparent fiction? Its proper place would be in a royal speech; it is worse than useless in a presidential épanchement. Whatever the President or anybody else may say, the world knows that it has been decided that, for all practical purposes, the Southern States are out of the Union, and may be kept out as long as the North pleases. "Individuals," it is true, "may commit treason and be punished," and "individuals" at the South did commit treason; but if this were all, President Johnson's business would be simply to hunt them down and bring them to trial. He would have no more right, for this reason, to set aside the State government in South Carolina, or decide, as he has decided there, who should vote for the constitutional convention, and what provisions it should incorporate in the State constitution, than in Pennsylvania or Connecticut. The very fact that he has had to adopt any "policy of reconstruction" is of itself a proof that the States are out of the Union, de facto at least. The emancipation of the negroes rests on this assumption; all the authority which Mr. Johnson is exercising at the South, over and above what Mr. Buchanan exercised, rests on it also. If the States were not out of the Union, we should like to know what there is in the fact of individuals committing treason to justify his interference with State elections, or his arresting the action of the State organization as he found it after the surrender of Lee?

The States are in the Union in the same sense that Victor Emmanuel used to call himself "King of Cyprus and Jerusalem." All that one hears about them "being in it," "of no power on earth being able to carry them out of it," etc., is simply words, and idle words at that, intended, no doubt, to make the public feel comfortably, but anything but complimentary to its understanding. The fondness of the Anglo-Saxon race for this kind of self-deception, and the coolness with which its members look one another in the face while covering the most monstrous absurdities in legal formulæ, is one of their most singular characteristics, and leads impudent Frenchmen to deny that they have emerged from the archaic stage of political development.

The actual position of the Southern States since May last has been that of conquered territory. If they were not conquered territory, they might have retained slavery, retained their old constitutions, and sent members to Congress without asking Mr. Johnson's leave, or even consulting him. He has no power, under the Constitution, to overturn State governments because individuals commit treason, except his power as the general of an army in the field, and, of course, he is too sensible a man not to know this. If we saw any good to be gained by bolstering up this little fiction of his, we should be delighted to do it. But we see mischief, and at this crisis great mischief, in all forms of falsehood, and particularly those that look most innocent.

"If I interfered," he says, "with the vote in the rebel States, to dictate that the negro shall vote, I might do the same thing for my own purposes in Pennsylvania." All this is painfully sophistical. He cannot, of course, interfere with anything in any State "for his own purposes." He has never done so; he is too upright a man to think of such a thing. He has interfered in the Southern States with the right of voting, for the public good. His very decision that those who possessed the franchise under the old State law should be the persons to vote for the State conventions was an interference. To permit implies a power to prohibit. He really decided who should vote, and he took his definition of the class who do so from the State law, simply as a matter of convenience or policy, not because he was in the least bound by that law. He knows perfectly well that any such interference with the suffrage in Pennsylvania would be a revolutionary act, and that it would be wanting in everything which distinguishes his conduct at the South from that of a usurping despot. If he could do all over the Union what he has done in South Carolina, as he says he could, instead of being the general-in-chief of a constitutional government, he would be simply an irresponsible tyrant.

His statement that if "they" (the Southern States) "go wrong, the power is in our hands, and we can check them at any stage to the end," is a capital specimen of the vague, and therefore in this case mischievous, use of language. What "end" does he mean? We can only check them till their admission to Congress. If the conditions imposed on them then be not sufficient, what becomes of our power of checking them afterwards? He surely does not mean to say that we shall have the power to go down and regulate their affairs for them by force after they are regularly re-admitted to the Union. That is a power which the people will not entrust for an indefinite period to any President. Mr. Johnson must make up his mind that now is his chance, and that any precautions he deems necessary for future peace and security must be taken at once. And if he is alarmed, as he says he is, by the possible effects of the immediate concession of the suffrage to the negroes, why not exact from the repentant prodigals some sort of security that they will concede it some time or other, that in one year, or two, or ten, the negro may by some process—reading, writing, declaiming, climbing a greased pole, or playing on the piano—cure the defect of color, and become an enfranchised citizen? Any barrier, however absurd, that a man can get over, is better than the utterly absurd and at the same time insurmountable barrier by which the colored race is at present shut out; and thus far no State has given evidence that it will ever at any time remove or modify it, nor has Mr. Johnson asked them to do so.

Mr. Johnson's opinions as to the mode of admitting the negroes to the enjoyment of political rights, as expressed to Major Stearns, are eminently sensible. The qualifications which he suggests should be exacted from them for the exercise of the franchise are not only such as must commend themselves to everybody as at least reasonable, but might, if made of universal application after a certain period—as Mr. Reagan advises that they should be in Texas—become the means of increasing the intelligence of the whole body of voters, and thus, as we believe, strengthen the foundation of our political system. But when the President informs us, in the next sentence, that letting the negroes have the suffrage now would "breed a war of races," we perceive that he has given the reins to his imagination, and is off once more into the regions of fiction. How does he know it would cause a war of races any better than he and most other Democrats knew four years ago, as they believed they did, that emancipation would cause a war of races? It is quite clear that we have not yet got at half the frightful consequences that are likely to flow from negro suffrage. "A Yankee" says it would lead to amalgamation,—that the white fathers would want to marry their daughters to blacks so as to have "mulatto grandchildren;" to the election of negroes to the Senate. The World says it would lead to the legal establishment of polygamy in all the Southern States, and the conversion of the negroes to Mormonism. Mr. Johnson now says it would lead to a "war of races." We shall probably hear next that it would cause an epidemic among the cows or a drying up of the oil wells. The powers of the "everlasting negro" are evidently not half revealed.

STATE SOVEREIGNTY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

The Anglo-American colonies were originally assemblages or societies of emigrant British subjects living on British territory under special municipal, or, if you will, political, organizations instituted by the Government of Great Britain for purposes of its own, and modelled in accordance with those purposes, and they were in all respects as completely integral and independent parts of the British Empire as the county of Hampshire, or as the city of London itself. I do not mean to assert, indeed, that the colonists were all, consciously, political agents of Great Britain. They had their special motives for emigration, the liberty of worshipping God according to their own consciences, the love of adventure, the spirit of commercial enterprise, and, in the high-born Adams and Eves of Virginia, still stronger reasons—escape from persecuting creditors, and very often a compulsory option between hemp and tobacco, the halter and the hoe. The colonies were encouraged by the crown as a means of extending the power and possessions of the British Empire. The colony of New England, too, afforded fine facilities for carrying out King James's high-minded and favorite plan of "harrying the Puritans out of the land," and Virginia was especially favored and petted as a retreat for broken-down gentlemen, and a place of banishment for convicted felons. The advisers of the crown determined the boundaries of the colonies according to their views of British interest, and no liberties were secured by the charter except such as were necessary to ensure the acceptance of the grant. The political existence conferred on the colonies by the royal charter was not a perpetual and irrevocable concession, but it was always modifiable or determinable by the will of the metropolitan legislature. An omnipotent Parliament could at any time have limited or even revoked the franchises conferred by those charters, to the same extent as it can lawfully interfere with the jurisdiction and rights of any municipal body lying territorially within the four seas. In fact, this exercise of power by the crown was one of the grievances stated in the Declaration of Independence, which also complained that the home Government often controlled and overruled the action of the colonial legislatures.

It is true that the power of Parliament, though theoretically unconditional has its limits; but these limits are moral, not legal; and the right of rebellion—a right of the "higher law" which belongs to every people whose rulers persistently and systematically transcend such limits—could justly be exercised by the colonies only upon such grounds as would justify the revolt of any other portion of the British Empire.

The colonies certainly possessed by their charters, and habitually exercised, many of the rights and powers appurtenant to independent sovereignties, as do the several States under the Constitution of the United States. The taking of private property for public use, for example, whether by taxation or by specific seizure, is one of the highest powers of sovereignty. This power was and is exercised by the colonies and by their successors, the States. But it is also exercised by almost every town corporation or other municipal body in Christendom, which, however, are not, for that reason, sovereign. But the colonies enjoyed and exercised other most important sovereign powers, which, by the acceptance of the Federal Constitution, were afterwards surrendered by the States. For instance, while still professing allegiance to the British crown, and long before the Revolution, they raised armies and fitted out ships of war for the defence of their soil and for offensive operations against the French and the Indian tribes; they coined money, emitted bills of credit, and regulated the currency within their own limits; they entered into compacts with each other, and, to a certain extent, legislated on the commercial relations of their own citizens, all of which were acts indicative of sovereignty, and all of which are expressly forbidden to the States by the Federal Constitution. The colonies possessed, then, not only all the indicia of sovereignty which South Carolina or New York can, or at any time could, boast, but many highly important prerogatives which the States have for ever renounced. But, notwithstanding all this, it never entered into the head of any man to contend that, while colonies, they were sovereign and independent states; and this for three chief reasons:

They wanted the characteristic token, the crucial test, of sovereignty—the right of negotiating treaties of commerce and maintaining political relations with foreign powers;

Their legislative power was limited by their charters, and in many cases subject to control by the home Government;

And their judicial proceedings were, under various circumstances, reviewable and reversible by legal tribunals not appointed by them or answerable to their jurisdiction.

In these cardinal particulars, then, the colonies were precisely on the footing on which the Federal Constitution places the States; for that embodiment of our organic law, Art. I., sec. 10, expressly forbids them to enter into any "treaty, alliance, or confederation," any "agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign power;" their legislation is not only limited by the Constitution, but its validity is determinable by the Supreme Court of the United States, a Federal tribunal; and the decisions of their State courts in cases involving questions of constitutional law are subject to the judgment of the same tribunal; besides which, litigant parties who are citizens of different States may withdraw their controversies from the cognizance of State courts and transfer them to the jurisdiction of the Federal judiciary. In other respects, as we have seen, the colonies partook much more emphatically of the character of sovereign powers than do the States, and yet, we repeat, nobody ever dreamed of claiming the attribute of sovereignty for them.

In reply to this reasoning, it may be denied that the considerations I have urged are the real grounds for refusing this attribute to the colonies, and it may be insisted that their dependent political condition was a necessary result of their allegiance to a foreign prince. There is no force in this suggestion. George the Third was, neither historically nor legally, a foreign prince with respect to the people of Virginia; his parliament was not a foreign legislature. All alike, prince, parliament, colonists, were natives and citizens of British territory—all of the same origin, the same language, the same empire, the same organic law; and no one of them all was legally or morally more foreign to any other than is the District of Columbia to the State of Massachusetts. But admitting the fact to be otherwise, the supposed consequence by no means follows. The sovereignty of a nation resides jointly in the prince or other government and the people. A king, a president, a legislature without a people, a people without a king, a chief magistrate or a government which itself recognizes, neither is nor can be sovereign. When, upon the death of Elizabeth, James succeeded to the throne, England owed allegiance to a foreign prince, for Scotland, the place of his birth, his first inherited kingdom, was, to all intents and purposes, a foreign state. But the English nation did not thereby cease to be a sovereign people, nor did Scotland, which for some time continued to be an independent kingdom, lose her sovereignty because her king had taken up his residence in a part of his realms out of her jurisdiction. England and Scotland were two sovereignties accidentally united, by the chances of hereditary descent, under the same head. Like instances are too common in history to need to be cited. The true reason, then, why the colonies were not individually or jointly sovereign, is, not that they were subjects of a foreign prince or state, but that they had not, either in conjunction with the prince or without him, either individually or collectively, the essential political powers and attributes of a distinct and independent people.

Up to the outbreak of the Revolution, then, the colonies neither were nor claimed to be in any sense sovereign and independent. When and how did they become so? Certainly not by the mere force of the resolutions or declarations of their individual legislatures or conventions; for no man would contend that Boston, or New York, or the county of Essex, or a confederation of two or more counties, or any mere arbitrarily separated fragment of British-American territory, could have erected itself into a sovereign and independent state simply by means of a resolution to that effect adopted by its common council, its magistracy, or a convention of delegates of its people. For the transformation of a colony or other integral part of a political state into a sovereign and independent power there must be—in addition to the fundamental requisite of a distinct and visible, or at least ascertainable, geographical as well as national or administrative individuality—a consent on the part of the present government, or the right, the will, and the power to become such on the part of the colony. Nor is it clear that, in all possible cases, even the consent of the metropolitan government alone suffices. Doubtless Great Britain, while still retaining her dominion over the rest of her colonial possessions, might have set off a convenient territorial portion, and, with the assent of its people, have severed it from the British Empire and made it an independent state. But it does not follow that she could have divided her entire American territory into ten or twenty arbitrary districts, and, even with the concurrence of the inhabitants of each as to its own independence, have raised them all to the condition of sovereign states, for the people of the several colonies had reciprocal rights and duties with respect to each other which England could not abrogate, and which the individual colonies could not repudiate.

We come now to the consideration of the true force and value of the much-vaunted declarations of independence by the several colonies previous to the National Declaration of July 4, 1776.

First—admitting that the people of the colonies had just ground and good cause for severing their connection with the British Empire and establishing a new and independent government for themselves—let us consider the effect of these individual colonial declarations as respects foreign powers, and as determining the true political status of the revolting territory. Doubtless, as has been already intimated, a colony or other portion of a sovereign nation may in many cases be separated from the parent state and become, at once, a sovereign and independent power by formal grant from the metropolitan government. Such would be the condition of the Canadas, or of Australia, if Great Britain, with the consent of the people, were to acknowledge their independence to-morrow. But in the case of a revolt, justifiable or not, a new political power cannot create itself by mere words, and acquire a political existence by its own declaration alone. The will of the new people to be free, and to constitute an independent and sovereign political organization, must be accompanied by the power to carry that will into effect. Its sovereignty and independence must be, not declared alone, but conquered and maintained by successive acts which require time for their accomplishment. There must be, first, a settled and avowed purpose of the revolting territory to sever itself politically from the parent country and to establish a new and independent organization; secondly, an actual overthrow of the former government by the military force of the territory; and, lastly, the establishment of regularly constituted legislative and judicial authorities, possessing and exercising such governmental functions and such physical means as to enable them, not only to administer the public interests of the citizens and protect their persons and property within the territorial limits, but, at the same time, to maintain towards foreign powers a position sufficiently imposing to secure those international commercial and political relations which are essential to the well-being of society.

The importance of this latter condition is not to be overlooked. The mere exclusion of the old government and its agents and the establishment of a new, will not alone suffice. If Ireland should revolt and drive every British soldier, every British official, from her soil, and should succeed in establishing and maintaining regularly organized political institutions, with all their machinery, but, at the same time, her coast should remain permanently blockaded by the fleets of her ancient mistress, so that she could not maintain free intercourse with foreign states, she would not have become a sovereign and independent nation, because she would not have acquired that liberty of action and those international relations which are essential to the existence of a state. School-boys who have barred out their teachers, prisoners who have locked out their jailor, are not thereby emancipated and free, however large and roomy their place of confinement. So long as they themselves are locked in, they are still held to be under the sway of those who kept watch at their gateways. It was by force of this principle that Great Britain and France, which, to say the least, were not unfriendly to the rebel cause, felt themselves constrained to defer recognition of Southern independence until the seceders should have practically both established their internal independence and opened to themselves free and unrestricted access to the great highway of nations.

Further, the conditions and constituents of sovereignty which I have indicated must have been, at least virtually, accomplished and acquired by the inherent strength of the new state; and so long as it is dependent on other states, powers, or territories for the enjoyment of these necessary elements of national existence, it is not a sovereign, not an independent, power, and no form or number of declarations or even foreign recognitions can make it so.

It would be idle to pretend, in the face of all historical evidence, that any one of the colonies had, previous to the national Declaration of Independence in 1776, individually acquired or enjoyed for an hour—a questionable proposition, that any one of the States which have succeeded to them could, even now, maintain—such a status as I have described. The people of no one of them ever had the right or the will, still less the power, to exist as a separate nation; not one of them did expel, or could have expelled, British troops from her soil without the aid of the rest; hardly could any one of the States, at this moment, defend alone its own frontiers and maintain the integrity of its soil against invasion from the others or from foreign States. Cornwallis was not compelled to surrender by Virginian troops, nor was South Carolina delivered from British sway by the unaided valor of her own sons. Our national existence was proclaimed by a national convention, our national victories were achieved, our national independence won, by national troops, and no soldier who shed his blood on the soil of another colony than his own imagined that he was dying a martyr to the liberties of a foreign land.

The early declarations of the several colonies, then, were but words, aspirations for a freedom the true nature of which those who uttered them understood imperfectly, and their mere opinions as to their true political interests were subject to the limitations of both their powers and their rights. That the colonies had no power to achieve their separate independence, is as certain as that the dozen or more nations and fragments of nations which compose the Austrian Empire are now physically unable each to conquer its individual sovereignty, and alone acquire and maintain a place as a member of the European system; and this brings us to the second point—the right, namely, of the colonies, severally, to individual independence and sovereignty. What right had a colony to declare itself sovereign and independent more than any county or town within its limits? Every one of these enjoyed some of the prerogatives of sovereignty, and the difference in this respect between them and the colony itself was merely in degree. The colonies did not differ from each other in nationality, in language, in fundamental legal institutions, in political principles, in any moral or material interest. They were not divided from each other by natural limits, and their respective boundaries were not framed with any view to their future political separation. In the ignorance of the interior geography of the continent which prevailed when the charters were issued, the most absurd mistakes were committed in defining the extent of the grants. In some cases the colonial claim reached to the coasts of the Pacific Ocean, to which England had no title. In others the boundaries described really enclosed nothing. In some instances the territories granted to different colonies ran across each other. If the separate declarations of independence of the colonies were valid, what common judicature was to determine the extent of the territory made sovereign by them, or to decide questions of title between colonies claiming soil embraced in the charters of both? The whole net-work of colonial boundaries was a cobweb of blunders; it was not merely an imaginary, but an impossible, division of territory which nature had made one, as the people were one, in origin, in allegiance, in tongue, in every great commercial, social, political, and moral interest. True, the respective founders of the different colonies were actuated by more or less different motives in seeking a new home in a new world. But in the century and a half which had elapsed since the first settlements in Massachusetts and in Virginia, the chasms between the opinions of the pioneers of emigration, like the vacancies between their territorial occupancies, had been filled up. Their civilization had a common tendency, their citizens were actuated by common aims, trained in common habits, pursuits, and views of social and political life, common interests had grown up, and the people had become fused into a nearly homogeneous mass, divided only by imaginary lines, which constituted no practical obstruction to the commingling and unification of the whole. In short, to change the metaphor, a new man-child had been born in the family of peoples, and the embryonic life of the colonies had developed itself into a nation. Even dialectic peculiarities of speech had almost wholly disappeared, and at the commencement of the war the people of the colonies were, in character, in opinion, in aspirations, in interests, and in speech, far more emphatically one than the population of Great Britain, or even of England itself. Under such circumstances, what right could a territorial jurisdiction, organized by the British Crown for purposes wholly of its own, separate itself from its neighbor colonies, and, because of grievances common to all and of which all complained alike, not only declare itself independent of the rule of the oppressor, but cut asunder all those links of common interest and a necessarily common fate which, in spite of local resolutions and declarations, bound, and still bind, indissolubly together the members of our great American commonwealth?

Nor let it be said that, on this point of sovereignty and independence, the colonies were bound by their reciprocal assent to each other's formal declarations. In those days of a vague political phraseology, of vague notions in regard to rights and powers now first questioned or now first claimed, men did not attach precise ideas to many of the terms which were bandied about by popular orators, by political writers, and even by legislators, and they had not yet come to a clear understanding of their own interests, their own necessities, their own mutual relations, rights, and duties. Hence such assent as is supposed, if, in fact, it had even been given—which, however, I do not concede as a historical fact—by no means proves that one party claimed, or that the other admitted, the pretensions which are now set up in behalf of the original sovereignty of the States. But there is another yet better answer. No one of the colonies being sovereign, no one could be made so by an assent which the others were legally incompetent to give. A family of infants does not become, respectively, sui juris because they agree to compliment each other on the attainment of a majority which none of them have reached, and the rights of an inchoate nation cannot be prejudiced, the organic development of an aggregate commonwealth defeated, by ill-advised concessions on the part of local authorities not legally empowered to grant them.

Upon the whole, I think the fact that, before the Fourth of July, 1776, colonial legislatures or conventions had declared an individual independence which they were unable to maintain, and which in the nature of things could not exist; and the further fact, if insisted on, that such declarations had been accepted as valid by other colonies as incapable of sovereign political action as themselves, created no rights, prejudiced no rights, as between such colonies. The colonies were legally released from British sway, not because they declared themselves emancipated, but because the abuse of all governmental power by Great Britain had worked a forfeiture of that power. They were discharged from apprenticeship by operation of law, not by their own will alone; but there was no principle of municipal or political law which could release them from their obligations to each other. As a formal acceptance of the legal conclusion that they no longer owed allegiance to a power which had betrayed its trust, as a renunciation of British sovereignty, their declarations were good. As the creation of a multitude of new, unrelated, independent sovereignties, they were impotent and ineffectual. Up to the national Declaration of Independence, then, no colony had become a sovereign State, and in future papers I shall endeavor to show that at no subsequent time did they attain to that condition.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

XVI.

Fayetteville, N. C., Oct. 20, 1865.

About fifty miles north of this city I came upon the upper edge of the sandy pine country, and left oak timber and red clay roads behind me. As I rode out of Raleigh the weather was bright and beautiful, and a soft wind blowing from the south suggested spring to the feelings, though autumn was visible in the many colored tints. But ten miles of the road were hardly passed before the few morning clouds began to spread over the whole sky, the first drops soon came down, and it was evidently setting in for a day's rain. The effect proper to the scenery of the pine barrens is produced best during an autumnal storm. Melancholy and sad always, it is dismal when the sky hangs low and gray over the landscape, when the tree-tops in the distance are obscured by vapor, and the rain, falling steadily on the sand and brown pine needles and rotten logs, forms wide sheets of water in the white road, and black pools where there is a little vegetable mould and the dead leaves are thickest. It is only necessary to come to a human habitation to make the scene appear still more lonesome and gloomy. The house itself is seldom more than a log-hut; in the brown expanse of cleared land many of the pines have been girdled, and hundreds of the lofty stems, bleached white, are standing and leaning at every angle, while the dark green forest, withdrawn a little from the road, is still more sombre than when one rides among the trees.

Splashing slowly along, I got so thoroughly soaked with rain before reaching any house where it would be pleasant to stay for the night, that it seemed as well to go on to Barclaysville as to stop short and leave my intended day's journey unfinished. Having ridden, according to my reckoning, twenty-four miles, I came to a large white house with several outbuildings. Taught by experience, I dismounted and asked if that was not Barclaysville. The woman said it was, and, therefore, knowing it to be professedly a house of entertainment, I preferred a request for lodging. She listened, and turning away, walked through the hall without making any reply. It was not a warm reception, but one soon gives up expecting that in Southern taverns. I proceeded to bring my saddle-bags under cover and to wring the water out of my clothes. In ten minutes a negro man came round to the gate and led my horse to the stable. I ventured to take off my spurs and knock again at the door. I asked for a room and a fire. Nearly a quarter of an hour's waiting ensued before I was taken from the piazza to a chamber. By dint of many more knocks I was able to get wood enough in small instalments to keep my fire going till supper time. Meantime a Federal officer had arrived, and the presence of a Yankee in uniform seemed to intensify the landlady's disagreeable feelings: "Sherman's bummers had come to her house on several occasions," she said with asperity. "She never could forget it to the Yankees. They were worse when they had officers with them than at any other times. Wheeler's cavalry always behaved like gentlemen, but the conduct of Sherman's men would have disgraced savages."

After supper the farmer came home, and him we found much more companionable. He was a ponderous man, six feet high, with a good-humored, honest face, and apparently of rather more than ordinary education and intelligence. He put a live coal in a large earthen pipe and asked for news. I spoke of the convention and the two important ordinances to be submitted to the people. "That 's what I call nonsense," he said. "Every voter 's taken an oath to support Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, and they know we can 't vote against the abolition of slavery. What 's the good of pretending you can say no when you can 't?"

The declaration of the convention that the secession ordinance had always been null and void he also stigmatized as nonsenical. "But we sent them up there to do the work," he added, "and we 'll have to be content with their way of doing it. I 'm just as loyal as anybody, and I 'm going to be a good citizen, but I believe we 've had a government here this last four years. There 's a good many trying to make out that they 've always been sound Union men, when the fact is we were all rebels together. I 'm in favor of acknowledging we 're whipped and asking forgiveness, and then if the United States won't take us back, why it 's not our fault. We 've got to eat dirt anyhow, as Vance says, but blamed if I think much of a man that pretends he likes it. I never could keep up with the politicians though."

I remarked that the convention had done nothing in reference to the negro testimony question, and asked him what he thought of it.

"Well, sir, I 'll tell you what I think: a white man can 't live in this country if a nigger can get to testify. I want to wait till they have more of an idea of the nature of an oath before I let one of them give evidence against me. Why, our lives would n't be safe. They must be educated and elevated first. It won't hurt 'em to wait a little. Let every man, white and black, when he makes a contract, have it in writing, with two witnesses, and there 'll be no trouble."

I asked him what he would do in cases where contracts were not in question.

"That might be bad, sure enough, in some ways, but it would produce more evil to let a nigger swear to anything and everything. I have n't any prejudices against 'em because they 're free, but you see I can 't consider that they 're on an equality with a white man. I may like him, but I can 't let him come to my table and sit down like either of you gentlemen. I feel better than he is. The nigger has a kind of a scent about him that 's enough for me. You Northern men need n't think that we hate 'em; I rather like 'em myself, and I believe we treat 'em better than you would. I know I never got so much work out of a nigger as some Yankees I 've seen. In North Carolina it was the hardest kind of work to get a slave convicted for any serious offence. We were so tender of them that we would n't let a slave be tried except by a jury of slaveholders. That do n't look much as if we were inclined to be too hard on 'em, does it?"

We discussed the subject at some length. His first answers were dictated by prejudice, and he seemed to have never before made the question a matter of thought; but at the last he admitted that the country would be harder to live in if negroes could not testify than if they could. In this respect he was like almost every other respectable man with whom I have conversed in North Carolina.

Colonization was the best policy, he thought. A nigger hated work, and had no ambition; he would do just enough to keep him from actual starvation. His wife believed that pretty much all the niggers she knew would a little rather starve to death than work for themselves or others.

The farmer listened with much interest to an account of Minnesota given by the Federal officer. He wanted to know if that State was in the latitude of Ohio, and appeared astonished beyond measure at the idea of an acre of land producing sixty bushels of wheat. He would n't mind spending a winter in the snow for the sake of the game and fish, but reckoned he never should get there; all his life he 'd wanted to go down in one of those Massachusetts vessels and catch these here mackerel fish, but had n't been able to do it. The Minnesota Indians must be bad neighbors, sure. 'T was the British Government taught 'em that fashion of scalping prisoners; paid 'em so much a scalp in the Revolutionary war.

So we spent the rainy evening in conversation and in watching our wet clothes drying before the fire. Candles were not lighted till bed-time, but the hearth was kept supplied with light-wood, and there was no need of lamps or candles. In the morning, which was clear and cool, I set out in company with the officer, who was going as far as the ferry over the Cape Fear River. He was an agent of the Freedmen's Bureau, and was on his way to Harnett County to organize a species of court or mixed commission for the trial of causes in which negroes and white men are the parties. His orders, based on recent instructions from Gen. Howard, were to associate with himself certain designated gentlemen, and the board thus formed was to have final jurisdiction in cases of comparatively small importance, while serious criminal charges were to be transmitted to the authorities at Raleigh. The citizens acting in these newly-instituted courts receive no compensation for their services.

A nine miles' ride in the bracing air, and through a country seemingly almost uninhabited, brought us to the Cape Fear, with its sluggish stream and banks of mud, on which willows were growing. The negro ferry-man had appropriated to his own use about a hundred and fifty yards of telegraph wire, which everywhere lies along the roadside between Raleigh and Fayetteville, and, stretching it from bank to bank, is able to dispense with a pole in setting his scow across. His people in Harnett had no abuse to complain of now, he said. "They 'd feel more better if one of the Yankees was on the spot to see about the dividin' of the crop—that was all." He refused to take any money for ferrying over the Superintendent of Freedmen, and walked some distance up the road to show him the way.

From the river I rode on alone through a thin forest, which showed all the signs of a turpentine region. Almost the only large tree to be seen was the long-leaved pine, and of these nearly every one was disfigured by the axe; the bark having been removed from the trunk in strips of various lengths, the naked place in some being eight or nine feet long, in others no more than fourteen inches; their width was from ten to fifteen inches. These broad scars at the top were shaped like a fish's tail, and at the bottom of each, near the root of the tree, was the "box" in which the turpentine is caught. These are holes cut in the trunk of the tree. Their length is precisely the same with the width of the "hacking" which is to supply them; in width, from front to back, they may be five or six inches, and in depth four or five inches, measured from the outer lip downwards and back in a slanting direction towards the heart of the tree. A virgin tree loses only a foot of bark from the box upward, and at the beginning of each successive year a foot more is taken. In trees a foot in diameter, but one box is cut, and in larger trees the hacker leaves a strip of living bark between each hacking, that they may not be girdled and die. It is the rule that the tree large enough for three boxes shall have but two, and that large enough for two, but one.

A little after noon I stopped at a farm-house, to have my horse fed, and listened for awhile to the grumbling of the farmer. He was not without excuse, for the house and all its surroundings spoke of poverty. The chimney was blown down, so that a fire could not be made; his farm looked as if seed sown there would be wasted; his son lay on a bed wrapped up in his overcoat, and shaking with the ague, and, it being just after dinner, his wife was dipping snuff. "He did n't know how much land he had," he said; "he knew it was monstrous hard to git a livin' off it; he farmed about thirty acres. Had been away that morning trying to git a nigger to come and help in the harvestin', fur his boy was too sick to do anything. More ager round this year than he ever knew before; but the boy 'd been well, if he'd not gone off to a Baptist meeting, and got tuck down agin. He could n't hire the nigger he wanted; he 'd started off somewhar, like all the rest. All wanted to travel, and go from pillar to post. One he had—never did own but one, a kind o' family nigger—was goin' off come New Year's. He did n't know what the old critter wanted, nor how she could live; had relations t' other side of the river, she said. He did n't want to keep her, for that matter; she was so old she could n't hardly see to thread her needle. The niggers used to be the happiest people on earth, with plenty to eat and plenty to wear, and no hard work, but they 'd find the difference now. On most farms they 'd been nothin' but a moth, and emancipation would n't hurt the farmers much, except some that had their wealth in 'em; but there was only a few large slaveholders in that country. Col. M. owned about a hundred black ones, and he was about the richest. The Yankees ought to colonize 'em in the territories, and he had heerd they was goin' to do it. He hoped it mout be, for a man that would n't work would have to steal, sartin'. An industrious one yer and thar 's nothin', and the best of 'em a man can 't put dependence in."

Within the past month I have heard a good deal said in favor of colonization, and said by owners of large plantations, who might be expected to desire a crowded labor-market. Speak to them about the vast expense, and other practical difficulties in the way of removing a whole nation from the country in which it has lived for generations, and which it loves, and one will say that the Government may have all his share in the public lands to pay it for taking away his niggers; another that he will gladly bear a heavier tax than has ever yet been imposed on him as his part of the expense, and that his acquaintances all say the same thing; and all cite Andrew Jackson's removal of the Indians as a case in point.

Thirteen miles from Fayetteville, I enquired my way of an old gentleman, who very civilly gave me copious directions, and with a crutch cane drew a diagram in the sand to make them the plainer. I spared him a quarter of an hour to give him the Raleigh news, and with the rest spoke of the new court then organizing in Harnett.

"That 's a very good thing; we needed something of that kind. Now, just to illustrate how the other system worked, I 'll tell you about my own experience. I 've been up before one of the Yankee officers myself. Sherman's wagons went along this road, you know, and of course some of the animals were pretty much used up, and they had to take 'em out of the harness. There were four or five that fell down between the bridge and the watering place—just could n't put one foot before the other; it was too bad to see 'em. One was an amazing lofty creature, too. I never worked so hard over a beast before. Well, I was out in the lot, and the captain came over and told me I was to pick up all these exhausted mules that could be found within a certain distance, and if I could bring 'em round again, the quartermaster at Raleigh would compensate me for my trouble. I was n't hardly able to do it. I 'd been confined to the house ever since '62, and could n't work much then, but I undertook it, not to see the beasts suffering, and I found five. I had feed carried out, and we raised 'em up on their feet again, and did all we could. Two out of the five I found right here by the pontoon, with a couple of niggers standing over 'em. 'Boys,' said I, 'you 've no business with these mules, they 're in my charge.' The mules were no good, they said; they 'd been working two hours to get 'em half a mile. 'No matter for that,' I told 'em; 'I was responsible for 'em, and they must leave 'em alone.' But they would n't; 'they were Sherman's men,' they said, 'and were going to take the mules to Raleigh.' 'Well,' said I, 'take 'em if you can get 'em there, though it 's plain they 'll die on the way; but remember that I 'll report you, and I 'd do the same for any man if he were white as the drifted snow from heaven. I do n't threaten this because you 're black; it 's my duty.' Luckily, for me, a soldier had come up and heard the dispute. Well, he began to swear at such a rate that the niggers started off. He was surprised at me to hear me talk so calm and mild with them. 'That 's the way a man ought to talk on business,' I told him. I reckon it was about a month afterwards that the same two men came to me with an order directing me at once to deliver to the bearers two mules, their property, or to appear on such a day in Fayetteville, and show cause why not. It was signed by one of these Freedmen's officers. Of course, there was nothing for it but to go to Fayetteville; so my son fixed up a side-saddle, and I went, though it was hard work, for I 'm sixty-nine years old, sir, and I had n't got well of my sickness, and never shall. The officer read me a written statement, that the niggers had made and qualified to, that I had forcibly taken from them, on such and such a day, two mules which they had purchased at the Government sales. Of course it was all a falsehood, and by means of what the soldier knew I convinced the officer that it was. I told him I did n't blame him for what he had done, for he could do no less if he believed their statement, but I thought it was rather hard to put me to the inconvenience of the journey, just on the assertion of the niggers. I told him I was sixty-nine years of age, and his court was the first I had ever been summoned before for any misdemeanor. I 'm very glad they 've established this court you speak of; it 's a vast improvement on the old one."

Leaving the old gentleman, I rode on over a solitary road through the forest, hardly seeing a house till I reached the outskirts of Fayetteville. "Yer seven miles and a half from Fayetteville," said an old woman, whom I found at her doorstep smoking, "and ye 'll hev to ride it to-night, stranger. But if ye ride a little peart ye 'll be thar early yit. Thar 's houses between, but ye won't git tuck in, for everybody 's too much worsted, and ye would n't git nothin' to eat."

It soon became very dark, and I rode along, wishing for the lights of the town, when suddenly I was startled by a loud whoop from the roadside. It was nothing but a negro trying to attract the attention of his companions at some distance ahead. Till we overtook them I walked my horse beside him, and listened to his talk. He knew I was a Yankee by my speech, he said. There was a heap of difference always between a Southern man and a Yankee, and he could tell one from the other very easy. He could n't help laughin' to remember what he used to think about Yankees—how they had horns, some on 'em, and on'y one eye. That 's what the rebels told him. He had n't felt sure which side would whip while the fightin' was goin' on; kept hearin' that the rebels was whippin' studdy, drivin' the Yankees back every battle he did n't know how many miles, so that he did n't know what to think. He pretty much give up. But he used to pray, and he knowed if the good time did n't come in his day it was sure to come sometime; that he knew, for the Scriptures said, "In the latter days all mankind, the small and the great, shall eat his bread in the sweat of his brow;" so the white folks would have to work as well as the black ones. But by-and-by Sherman came, and his army covered the face of the earth. "Great God, what a company!"

He was employed on a farm now, he said, and got six dollars a month; he should try to get work in a turpentine orchard. Wages were better in that business, and besides it was more agreeable to work in the shade, and the smell of the rosin was healthy.

Fayetteville is a pleasant town of six or seven thousand inhabitants, on the west bank of the Cape Fear River. Its numerous stores and warehouses are large and solidly built of brick, so that the city seems designed, not so much for the residence and workshop of its own people as for the business uses of a wide extent of country. This peculiarity belongs to the appearance of many small Southern towns as distinguished from those of the same size at the North. The chief business of Fayetteville is the shipment of tar, rosin, and spirits of turpentine down the river to Wilmington, and the sale of manufactured goods to the farmers round about. The river has been lower this season than for twenty seven years previous, and trade is inactive at present, but it appears to be a busy and thriving town.

The following conversation, which I had this morning with a colored citizen of Fayetteville, may serve to show what are the hopes and expectations that have been formed by the most intelligent men of this class—those who deserve to have and who have the most influence with their fellows—the men who framed the recent address of the colored people to the State Convention. He is a barber by trade, a light-colored man, good-looking, and with a face expressive of good sense and good-feeling. He had been a slave all his life till set free by the war, but had taught himself reading and writing, and his talk showed that he had made good use of those acquisitions. What he has read, his reflection upon it, and a careful study of events on which so much for him and his race was depending, has furnished him with a set of opinions in which there is nothing of violence, though they are very decided, and has fitted him to be a leader and counsellor among his own people. This prominence seems to affect his interests injuriously, for his white customers have withdrawn their patronage from the shop of a man who allowed himself to be sent as a delegate to the negro convention.

As to the question whether or not the South shall be re-admitted to the Union before granting the right of suffrage to the negroes, he says that he and his people are quite indifferent. Many care little or nothing about it at all, and many are perfectly willing to wait a few years, thinking that they will not have long to wait. He himself believed negro suffrage a necessary consequence of negro emancipation, if emancipation was made complete. If a black man could testify in court, and in all respects enjoy equality before the law, he would soon begin to educate himself and acquire property, and otherwise make himself respectable, and so prepare the way for his admission to the polls. Both of the great parties would be waiting for them by that time, for the colored population would be an element of such power that the Democrats would try to seize it if the Republicans were not beforehand with them. The South would need them, too, so that all things considered, he expected to be a legal voter in his native State before he was five years older.

But the right of negroes to testify was something absolutely necessary, and he hoped that Congress would admit no State which had not granted it. If the North Carolina Legislature were to meet to-day, it would probably exclude the evidence of colored men; hardly a man could be found at present to say a word in favor of it. A year or two would probably change the popular opinion; but he hoped that Congress, to prevent the troubles of this year or two, would declare that no State had a republican form of government if every free man in it was not equal before the law, equal so far as the witness-box was concerned; he would n't insist on admission to the jury-box, for it required more sense to be a juror than to be a voter. But who could think it strange if a negro, ignorant and without friends, when he felt that he had no place to go for justice, should take the law into his own hands? Then white men would do the same, they would n't wait either, and there would be nothing but bloodshed and burning.

Very few of the former slave-owners would give a negro a fair chance, and for this reason, as well as to allow time for the minds of the people to cool and to make it possible for the Legislature to be just, he wanted the Freedmen's Bureau kept in existence another year.

He laughed at the idea of a negro insurrection, and said he wished those who talked of it could know his people as well as he knew them. The worst to be feared was the occurrence of individual cases of violence or theft, when some negro saw no other mode of redress; but there never would be a black rebellion. The negroes wanted nothing so much as to live in peace with the white people of the States. What they had done in this very town, in respect to calling in a garrison of negro troops, was sufficient proof of that. When Sherman's soldiers were first taken away from Fayetteville, and the town was put into the hands of the citizens, they showed a disposition to revive the slave code, and to enforce certain city ordinances that were full of the old spirit; negroes were not to be allowed to meet together for worship, unless a white man was present in the assembly; no negro was to carry a walking-cane; one man, after being convicted of some offence, was publicly whipped, and two men who lay in jail, awaiting trial, were taken out and whipped by persons who had no shadow of authority. The colored people did n't think such doings looked like freedom, and some of them began to talk about petitioning for a garrison of negro troops. The citizens were very much afraid they 'd do it, but after consultation among themselves, my informant said, "it was decided not to ask for a garrison, but for an agent of the Freedmen's Bureau to come up and adjust the difficulties. We knew that if we wanted to bring about a state of bad feeling between the white folks and the darkies, the surest way to do it would be to bring negro soldiers into town. Besides, we knew from what we had seen in Wilmington, that a negro regiment always has a bad influence on the other negroes, who learn to hang around the camp and be idle. The soldiers stir up strife of all kinds."

The action of the negroes in that matter might have been misconstrued if they had tried to keep white soldiers away. Certainly they prayed about as hard for Sherman to go as they had prayed for him to come. He did n't believe there was a darkey house in the town that the "Bummers" had n't ransacked. A negro with a good suit of clothes, or a new pair of shoes, was halted at once and made to exchange. He laughed heartily as he described a party of them stealing his razors and other implements of his trade. But at any rate the conduct of Sherman's army had produced this good effect on the minds of the Fayetteville negroes—they no longer believed that every man of Northern birth must necessarily be their friend, and they more clearly saw the need of looking to themselves for their own elevation. That was the true policy to be adopted, and the policy which eventually was sure of adoption and of success.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, October 7.

I TOLD you, when I closed my last week's letter, that the list of English holders of Confederate stock which was brought over by the mail, then just arrived, would create a stir. My expectation has been fulfilled. But before I speak of this, let me say something as to the authenticity of the document. Of course, it is impossible for me to know what grounds the New York Times may have had for accepting it as genuine. But any Englishman with any knowledge of the world could tell that, to say the least, it did not bear the impress of truth. In the first place, remarkably shrewd men of the world, like many of the supposed bondholders, would never have taken such a stock in their own names; in the second, they would never have held on to such large amounts when the bonds were falling day by day as they did for weeks; and in the third place, many of them were singularly unlikely to have risked their money in what, to take the most favorable view, was a very doubtful transaction. I am by no means a fanatical admirer of Mr Gladstone, nor have I absolute confidence in his political honesty. But I in company, I believe, with every person who has ever come in any way into contact with him, have absolute reliance upon his personal integrity. Throughout a long public life—himself a poor, almost a needy, man at times—he has kept himself pure from the very suspicion of jobbery. Even his bitterest opponents—and few men have been attacked more bitterly—have never ventured to accuse him of seeking personal advancement. And in his position as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and foremost among the ministers of the crown, it would have been a positive disgrace to him if he had dabbled in the loan in question. Every candid person who read the list on Saturday felt certain the insertion of Mr. Gladstone's name was a mistake; and if the list was wrong in one particular, the whole document was probably erroneous. [Mr. Gladstone's name was inserted in England.—ED. NATION.]

Everybody expected that on Monday morning we should see a vigorous disclaimer of the truth of the statements on the part of the persons inculpated. Strange to say, however, the Times allowed five whole days to pass from the arrival of the list without disputing its truth. And stranger still, the despatch of Mr. Seward with reference to the Prioleau case was passed over in complete silence. Topics of public interest are singularly scarce just now, and the only deduction even the most charitable could form from this suspicious silence was that, for some reason or other, the "Thunderer" thought it more prudent to hold its tongue. "Least said the soonest mended," is a wise maxim for men in a scrape; but the adoption of the policy recommended by the adage is almost an acknowledgment that there is nothing to be said. Acting on some conclusion of this kind, the Morning Star, which, as the representative of the late Mr. Cobden's friends, has a bitter personal grudge against the Times, wrote a very bitter article upon the supposed exposure of the venal motives which had induced Mr. Delane and his colleagues to espouse the cause of the Confederacy. The article would have been well merited enough if it had been founded upon fact. It brought out, however, a most furious onslaught from the Times, utterly repudiating the story that either Mr. Delane or Mr. Sampson, the city editor, had ever speculated or held shares in the Confederate loan. Ever since the Times became the chief English journal, one of its firmest traditions has been in all its original matter to ignore the very existence of any other newspaper. To such an extent was this rule observed, that even when it was found necessary to combat a statement in another paper, the most elaborate periphrasis was constantly employed to avoid the necessity of allowing its name to appear in the columns of the Times. But on this occasion the rule was disregarded, and we were treated to a savage article against the Star by name, as personal in its character as if it had appeared in the Eatanswill Gazette. The Star made a somewhat lame apology in reply, and there, as far as the two newspapers are concerned, the matter ended. With regard to the particular issue, the worst you could fairly say of either paper was that the Star was premature in giving credence to the story, and the Times was unduly dilatory in disavowing it.

As yet the only persons who have not written to disclaim the correctness of the insertion of their names amongst the list of Confederate bondholders are the commercial men, like Isaac Campbell & Co., Messrs. Bigbee, Fernie, Callie, Gilliatt, Forbes, Campbell, and the directors of the London Trust Stock Bank. Amongst men of rank, the Marquis of Bath, Sir Henry de Houghton, Sir Coutts Lindsay, Lady Georgiana Fane, Lord Campbell, Lord Donoughmore, and Lord Richard Grosvenor have, as yet, thought it unnecessary or imprudent to deny the truth of the charge; while I am glad to say that Mr. Spence, of Liverpool, is the only man of any intellectual repute whatever who remains silent beneath the imputation. If you ask me how far I believe these disclaimers, I must say I do so thoroughly. No man occupying a public position in this country could sign his name to a distinct falsehood without the certainty of losing his character in the event of detection.

To me, the most remarkable feature in the whole matter is the change of public feeling in England illustrated by this incident. Taking the views for granted which were current in English society not a year ago, it is very difficult to understand why it should be considered a discreditable act to have advanced money to the Confederacy. There is no sin in losing your money, and nobody is ashamed of having subscribed to the Greek, or Spanish, or South American loan, or any one of the many loans which have been introduced on the London market in behalf of some oppressed nationality supposed to be struggling for independence. I know scores of persons in London who are extremely proud of having sent out arms, and ammunition, and supplies to assist Garibaldi in overthrowing the Bourbon government in Naples; and yet if, as we were constantly assured by the chief authorities, in Parliament and the press, the cause of the South was that of "a gallant nation fighting gallantly for freedom," why on earth should it be wrong to have aided the Southerners with money as well as with good words and wishes? Of course, be the merits of the struggle what they might, men in the position of Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Delane had no business to have any pecuniary interest in Confederate funds; but Mr. Beresford Hope, Mr. Gregory, or Mr. Lindsay were simply practising what they preached, if they assisted the Confederacy by any legal means in their power. Yet these gentlemen are as indignant now at the supposition of having held Confederate stock as if they were accused of having picked a pocket. To do Mr. Hope justice, nobody would suspect that his advocacy had been purchased by a bribe of forty thousand pounds of any doubtful stock. His wealth, apart from his character, would protect him from such a suspicion. The only possible explanation is, that public feeling has awoke to the conviction that the cause of Secessia was a disreputable one, in which England never ought to have taken any part, directly or indirectly. The growing unpopularity of the Southern cause is due very largely, perhaps, to its utter failure; partly, too, to the tameness with which, in the opinion of their former admirers, the Confederates have accepted their defeat, and, in no small measure, to a worthier cause. At last the British public cannot close its eyes to the fact that the triumph of the North ensures the destruction of slavery. It may seem astonishing to you that this perception should only just have reached us. As a nation, I admit freely, we were stupidly blind with reference to the real character of your contest. To a certain extent we were, no doubt, wilfully blind. But be the cause stupidity or obstinacy, our blindness was an undoubted fact; and till very recently the British public sincerely disbelieved that emancipation would be the result of the Northern victory. That illusion is now dispelled, and when once the English instinct recognized the fact that the support of the Confederacy had really meant the support of slavery, the pro-Southern feeling died rapidly away. This reaction of popular sentiment is the real reason why the whole tribe of pro-Southern sympathizers—the members of Parliament who put themselves out of the way to show civility to Messrs. Mason and Slidell, the writers who could never find epithets vituperative enough for the North, or laudatory enough for the South—now turn round and pretend to be indignant at the idea that they could have aided or abetted the Confederate cause by the loan of money. I, and I think most independent men, should have had more respect for them if they had stuck to their text. The "causa victa" may be a very bad one, but still it is scarcely honorable to desert it the moment its defeat is acknowledged. At the present time these pro-Southern sympathizers, who repudiate all connection with the loan, are very much in the position of the Scotchman who said he would swear to the truth of his assertion, but would not bet.

In spite of the heat of the weather and the manifold reasons which would naturally induce any reasonable being to prefer the open air to a heated lecture-room, the annual gatherings of our scientific and philosophical societies have been unusually crowded. Everybody who has any crotchet of his own to ventilate has gone to the Social Science Congress, at Sheffield. In itself, I do not wonder at this. Given a theory, the desire to diffuse it is stronger than almost any passion to which mortality is subject. But what is to me a mystery is why hundreds and thousands of rational human beings, who have no hobbies of their own to ride, should be found ready to listen patiently and willingly to the discourses of any one who has a theory to propound. Surely, England and America are the only two countries in the living world in which grown-up men and women find delight in attending lectures at local athenæums. Lord Brougham, of course, delivered an inaugural address, and mumbled forth the usual string of commonplace platitudes intended to be profound. There were the usual elaborate disquisitions, "de omnibus rebus et quibus dem aliis," and as much twaddle was talked as the audience could be induced to listen to. The one "live" speech, if I may judge from the reports, was that of Mr. Hughes, the member for Lambeth. Speaking in the model city of trade combinations, as the professed advocate of the working-men, and before a large assemblage of mechanics, Mr. Hughes had the courage to point out the absurdities and iniquities of the trade-union system. He dwelt upon the suicidal policy of opposing the introduction of machinery, on the unfairness of interfering with the private habits of the members, and on the injustice of interdicting mechanical improvements which would materially diminish the deleterious effects of working in an atmosphere of steel-dust. Unwelcome as many of his truths were, they were received patiently enough by the working-men, who admitted the substantial justice of many of his charges, but pleaded that the worst feature in the trade-unions—the system of intimidation pursued towards non-members—was now done away with. I hope the defence may be true, but in the height of a strike, when men are starving for want of work, they will never tolerate calmly the spectacle of other men performing their work on the very terms they themselves have struck to avoid compliance with. I have no love for trade-unions, as I think them injurious to the country; but if I was a working man I should assuredly belong to them; and all the papers ever read at social science congresses will not persuade working-men—or any other set of men, for that matter—not to study their own interests.

A church congress, too, has been held this week at Norwich, at which an enormous number of Church of England clergymen have assembled to discuss the condition of the religious world. The most noteworthy feature about the meeting to the laic mind was the determined stand made by all the clerical speakers in favor of the Establishment in Ireland. Some of the speakers went so far, indeed, as to acknowledge that a national church which was only the church of some sixth part of the population was an anomaly; but one and all declared it must be maintained, notwithstanding. And Archdeacon Denison, who has a fatal talent for saying what his own supporters would sooner have left unsaid, blurted out the remark that, if we once admitted the principle that a national church must be the church of the majority, it was by no means absolutely certain that the Church of England herself had any right of existence.

To turn from the pulpit to the stage, we have had this week a most unusual occurrence in the theatrical world. A play has been within an ace of being damned. Now-a-days, the words "subject to approbation"—with which a new piece is still announced at some of our theatres—have become a mere formula. A play may be successful or not, but it is run till it ceases to draw. The truth is, that the regular audiences of play-goers, who used to sit in judgment on new dramas in the days of the Keans and Kembles, have disappeared utterly. Each night the London theatres are crammed, but they are crammed with fresh audiences composed of strangers. The railroads have so united town and country that a new provincial public has been called into existence for London play-houses. The approval or disapproval of one night's audience has little, if anything, to do with that of the ensuing or preceding one. Amongst many other causes of the decline of our drama, I take this to be a not unimportant one. As things are, theatrical managers never contemplate the possibility of having to withdraw a piece the first night because it does not suit the taste of the public. However, for once, this fate was very near befalling Mr. Charles Reade's dramatized version of "Never Too Late to Mend," which was produced at the Princess's on Wednesday last. The novel was an immense success over here, and, I believe, was very popular in America. Several versions of it have already been brought out on the stage; but without the author's sanction or supervision. Considerable interest was felt about the play, by that small literary world which still cherishes the grand traditions of the English drama, from the fact that Mr. Reade is the only literary man of eminence who has sought, of late years, to gain fame as a play-writer; and the audience assembled on the first night was, as usual, a friendly one. Unfortunately, the famous prison scenes in the novel, where the boy Josephs is tortured to death, proved so disgusting in their ghastly literalness of reproduction, that the play was almost hooted off, and only brought to a close after much stormy opposition. Mr. Reade is a pre-Raphaelite amongst modern dramatists. Anything in his play was nothing it not real. We had a real tread-mill, and live wardens and felons in real gaol attire, and a real crank, and a real iron stair-case, and everything as like a real prison as art could make it. If our English theatre were flourishing, I should say this realistic tendency was a very dangerous one; but it has sunk so low, nothing could well injure it.

As a curious little scrap of history, bearing on the great question of your day, let me quote to you an opinion of the great Napoleon with reference to the negro question, which, I believe, is very little known. Half a century ago a certain Lord Vernon—one of the Fox and Holland set—called upon Napoleon at Elba, and had a long conversation with him on many subjects, the particulars of which he recorded in a long letter, which has lately been reprinted for private circulation. Amongst other subjects touched on in the conversation was that of slavery in St. Domingo, about which the Emperor expressed himself thus:

"The only mode of abolishing slavery altogether would be to permit polygamy. He had proved this opinion at Cairo, where he had observed that difference of color does not affect the estimation which belongs to individuals. He attributed this quality to the prevalence of polygamy. Men are 'gourmands en amour,' and, when permitted, will prefer having wives of various colors. The customs of the East allowing this indulgence, females of different complexion frequently meet together under the roof of the same husband from distant parts of the Asiatic and African continents. Thus the offspring of a white, a mulatto, and a black are brought up together, sit at the same table, and receive the same education, which removes the prejudices prevailing generally amongst the whites against persons of color. He therefore had proposed once to a French bishop that polygamy should be permitted in the West Indian Islands; but monseigneur would not hear of it."

So much for the Napoleonic solution of the negro question.

RESTAURANTS AND THEIR FUNCTION.

When the "Physiologie du Goût" was written, the author conceived it to be his duty to set forth the actual and possible uses of restaurants It might have been thought by a less enthusiastic writer of the time when gastronomy was in its glory in Paris, and some of the great restaurateurs of the first dynasty in the zenith of their power and their fame, that this question was disposed of; but Brillat-Savarin gave the world a page on the advantages of restaurants with the gravity of a philosopher announcing newly discovered truths to an expectant world. Four good reasons he found why there should be restaurants—reasons which it is not necessary to quote or to translate verbatim, reasons quite sufficient and satisfactory, but likely to occur to every one, reasons which were certainly not needed to convince those for whom restaurants were intended—those "qui n'ont point de cuisine chez eux, ou qui en sont momentanément privés."

But this disappointing book—which we never open without renewed wonder that it has so long maintained unchallenged its position as the Koran of gastronomy, which fails to take high ground in considering the whole important subject, which treats the whole commissariat department of the world's industry as a mere means of luxury—fails in this also, that it scarcely alludes to the principal and only essential good quality, the highest and only very high value, of that important institution, the restaurant. As mere accidental conveniences or as places of self-indulgence they would be unworthy of our consideration.

It is to be regretted that Dr. Samuel Johnson never wrote the cookery book which he proposed to write. But it is vastly more to be desired that some modern philosopher should do so. The valuable works of Ude, Soyer, and Francatelli leave a gap yet unfilled. They are written by men of active life, engaged in the arduous duties of their profession, and treat of cookery and its attendant arts too much as these arts are practiced in their own kitchens. Soyer's experience, indeed, is wider and more general; but his published works are, nevertheless, too much the maxims of the empirical practitioner, too little the consideration of the subject from a stand-point whence it can all be viewed. Mr. Kirwan's "Host and Guest" is intended to supply the deficiency, but it is too hasty, too ill-arranged, too vague, and contains really too little matter of importance to be of any permanent value.

The restaurant is a potent civilizer. The restaurant is progress. The restaurant is as important a branch of that modern material civilization of which we brag so heartily as the railroad or the telegraph. The mere fact of rapid motion is not in itself more important than the fact of good and wholesome food. The restaurant offers such aliment as all men should have to the few who have ample means. In like manner, the railroad moves the tolerably rich rapidly, but in intense discomfort and at peril of life and limb. We expect that in the far future all the community will be able to travel swiftly, with tolerable comfort, and with comparative safety. In like manner, we expect that in the far future all men will be fed as nature certainly would feed them if the cooks would let her.

"God sends meat, and the devil sends cooks." There is no man of sensitive organs who has not felt that this task of the devil's has been discharged with all the vigor, completeness, and personal attention to details which that potentate gives to every work he undertakes. His emissaries of the white cap and apron are everywhere and always busy. Discomfort, sickness, and premature death abound, which are as clearly their work as if they uniformly mixed in what they prepare quicker-acting poisons than those in which they are accustomed to deal. And if the devil has cooks in his pay, he has wine merchants as well. It is a theme too unsavory to dwell on; moreover, it is a theme on which nearly every one can learnedly discourse. The dealers, indeed, have so vitiated the taste of the people that but few can tell where the poisons are, but everybody knows that they are almost everywhere. Go out of the city on any railroad you choose, stop at any station, hap-hazard (always supposing you reach the first station in safety), go to the best hotel, eat the best dinner you can select from the crowded bill-of-fare, drink the highest-priced or most promising-titled wine on the list—and be sure that you have dined very badly and shortened your life as much as added dyspepsia and internal disorder can do it. Does any one wonder why the farmers' wives and daughters are so sickly and wan, and either die young or live to withered and infirm old age? Probably not, for the three causes are known to everybody—over-work or, at least, over-anxiety, foul air in the dwelling, and ill-chosen and ill-prepared food, especially old pie. Of these causes the last is not the least. The execrable, astounding, crushing badness of the food of most of our rural population is a sad thing to think of; a most mortifying thing to think of in connection with the general excellence of the raw material from which it is made, and the expense and trouble that go to the preparations for the table. Nor have the dwellers in cities much cause to think themselves more civilized than their brethren of the "rural districts." They also live badly enough, so badly that worse would be thought impossible but for the experience of the country; for them also is the generous provision drawn from hill-side, prairie, meadow, and sea manipulated and tortured into a barbarous diet, to which the fare of Kalmuck, Abyssinian, or Tasmanian is at once an Apicius' feast and a Graham's wholesome regimen.

The use of the restaurant is to raise the standard of good living. It cannot be set too high. We cannot require too much of our purveyors. No dish is too plain, no process of preparation too simple, no article of food too cheap and popular, no stimulating or comforting drink too commonplace, to be made to conform to the highest standard of excellence which the wit of man can set up. And it is the influence of restaurants, and this influence only, which, up to this time, has been found available to establish and maintain any such standard of excellence.

Are there objections to restaurants? Let us consider them. Do they minister to luxury? If so, the blame is with the luxurious. Tailors and silversmiths—yes, and booksellers and painters—administer to luxury; but the blame is with the luxurious. If anybody spends his fortune on eating, the fault was in him from the beginning, and he would have spent his money other ways if not in this way. If anybody ruins his health by excess, not in the restaurant that filled his orders without question. Let us say, with Dr. Holmes, and go further and say, with Brillat-Savarin,

"—— the bane is in his shallow skull,"

"'Tis but the fool that loves excess;"

"The man of wit alone knows how to eat;"

and again:

"Tell me what you eat, I will tell you what you are."

And luxury itself should not be denounced as if it were unmingled guilt. Luxury is good, when it can be harmlessly indulged. The man who despises luxury, or does n't enjoy it when it is within his reach (as Theodore Winthrop has said somewhere), is an incomplete man; it is he only who cannot dispense with luxury that is "a weakling and a soft." The daily outlay on your table of sums of money that would give you the companionship of literature and art, that would give you a horse to ride, that would enable you to add in many ways to the world's wealth, is wrong; but, it being granted that comfort is absolute good, and worth striving for, it is hard to deny the additional proposition that luxury is good too—when it can be innocently enjoyed. And, at all events, whatever its possible evils, it has this certain good—that, but for luxury, comfort would not be so general and so accessible. If the restaurant found no patrons but health-seekers and very moderate diners indeed, fellows who

"——almost could dine on a poulet au riz, (Fish and soup, and an omelet and that),"

and wine-drinkers who are satisfied with sound Medoc, or table sherry, the growth of the great interest we are considering would assuredly be slower. They who indulge "without limit" in the pleasures of the table, help to maintain in great perfection those great establishments which set up the standard of good living. As the Cossacks who, in 1815, carried away half a million bottles of champagne from M. Moet's cellars were capital advertising agents—Russian orders for his wine burthening the mails for years thereafter—so the Clos Vougeot and Steinberger carried away en détail by extravagant diners help to give a better wine at a lower price to those who limit their outlay to that which will buy the wholesome and pure. The expensive dishes, which it is well not to eat or pay for too often, help toward the providing of good soups and roast and boiled meats for people of abstemious habits.

Moreover, there is to be considered the inducement which is offered to men of ability to devote themselves to cookery. It is probable that those men whose names stand highest as cooks, who have not been in the devil's service, would have declined a trade that offered them no prize more brilliant than the satisfactory consciousness of having benefited humanity. Fame was not so to be gained, nor fortune, nor was even contemporary reputation so sure to follow merit. But as ministers to the pride of nobles and princes, and partners of their social celebrity; as inventors of dishes, by means of which their names would be immortalized, their ambition was gratified and their talent improved at once. Béchamel would not have begun the era of modern cookery but by being satisfied to rule the household of Louis Quatorze, and give his name to an indispensable sauce. Carême père, immortalized in another way, took, not gave, a name, and is known now by the French title of that season of Lent whose rigorous diet he turned into enjoyment. Vatel, who killed himself because he thought his arrangements to entertain Louis Quatorze had failed, and would not survive the disgrace, would probably have felt less enthusiasm in the service of the world of common people whose daily food most needs the services of such men as he. And the restaurateurs, also—Beauvilliers, who first kept a restaurant on modern principles; the brothers Véry, who long reigned supreme; the famous and unforgotten Trois Frères Provençaux—such men have gained an enduring fame by service to the refined sensuality of the rich, which they might not have gained by helping the general public to that which they so much need. So that, without giving any credence to the transparent fallacy that the extravagance of the rich helps the poor directly by distributing money, we cannot lose sight of the good that may indirectly result from that extravagance when it tends to raise the standard of any branch of human industry.

The standard of good fare is raised, we have said, by the restaurant; not should be raised, but is, of necessity, from the very nature of the institution. What is a restaurant? We cannot object to Brillat-Savarin's definition of a restaurateur, which carries with it the explanation of the nature of his establishment, and which we thus translate:

"A restaurateur is he whose trade consists in offering to the public a feast always in readiness, the dishes composing which are separately furnished in portions, at a fixed price, at the command of customers."

We have been thus particular in defining a word which to many must seem to need no definition, because we exclude from the rank of restaurant all establishments which provide a "table d'hôte," and even those which offer meals "à prix fixe." The restaurant proper is altogether "à la carte." The permanent bill-of-fare of dishes served every day, and dishes which can at any moment be prepared to order, has a constantly changing appendix, the carte du jour. The habitué knows what the always-to-be-had dishes are; he needs only to consult the daily menu; that he studies with religious care, and the limits within which he can choose are thus laid down before him. The duty of a restaurateur is, then, to provide day by day a varied and abundant table, from which the chance comer may select, according to his taste and means, the dish or the many dishes which he may require for breakfast, déjeuner (a very different thing, in spite of the dictionaries), luncheon, dinner, supper, or snack or collation of any sort, and at any hour from daylight till midnight. But he adds to this first and, on the whole, most important duty, the consequent charge of providing, "noces et festins," dinners and breakfasts and feasts of all kinds according to previous order and agreement as to price. The agreement having been made with him to furnish a dinner for ten persons at blank francs or dollars a head, it is left to his skill and ambition to provide suitably and worthily for the occasion.

The tendency, then, of a true restaurant is necessarily upward, for the inducement is irresistible to provide constantly greater variety, choicer selection, more faultless cookery, and to charge such prices as will prove remunerative. Nor is the argument à priori at all needed in this case, for experience has shown that this is the tendency of individual establishments and of the whole restaurant system.

Where is the best cookery in Europe? In France. And where are the best and most numerous restaurants? Also in France. There are a dozen restaurants of name in Paris alone, each of which is better than the best elsewhere in Europe. With critical acumen the experienced bons-vivants declare that the establishment of the Frères Provençaux is eminently successful in two dishes only—côtelettes provençales and morue à l'ail; that Véry's restaurant made and deserves its fame because of its judicious use of the truffle, and that Robert and Philippe have but little success except in dinners ordered in advance; but all this is comparative only. All these, and Bréban's and Véfour's establishments, with others, are first-rate restaurants, and a first-rate restaurant is one where every dish served approaches absolute perfection. But in France good cookery is general. As no American can form any accurate conception of what is meant by these words, unless he has seen and experienced the delightful truth, we may be allowed a word or two in explanation of our apparently ridiculous assertion. First, then, the traveller steps into any café at the Palais Royal, or along the principal streets or on the boulevards, the refreshment that he takes will be well prepared and neatly served, the coffee hot, strong, and fragrant, the bread, butter, and milk excellent, the ices almost perfect, the cognac excellent and pure. At every corner boys thrust into his hand little bills, from which he learns that this traiteur and that offer dinners at one and a half francs, at two francs, and at three francs, and that for two francs he will have "a good soup, two dishes, one of vegetables, a salad, a dessert, and a flaçon of wine," and at other prices in proportion. Let him try any one of them, say at three francs, and he will find a better dinner than he will get at any American hotel table, and a half-bottle of wine of a quality as good as claret for which we are accustomed to pay long prices. But he can go lower and try the crêmeries, at each of which he will find an old lady who will make him an excellent omelet with two eggs or with three, at his choice, give him a great bowl of delicious café-au-lait and a mountain of sweet and delicate bread, for a price whose smallness will astonish him. Or he may leave Paris and wander forth over the land of France, and he will find strange things. He will find restaurants, cafés, and estaminets where what is set before him is really fit to eat and drink. He will find (incredible as it is) the buffets of the railroad stations the best restaurants in their respective towns. He will find skilful and savory preparation of food among the towns-people and the peasantry, with such economy of fuel, and such small space occupied by the work, as seems fit for doll-house cookery only. Now, we do not assert that the restaurants have brought all this about, but that they help it is evident, and that where restaurants are not, the good cooking is not, is as evident. Take England as proof negative. There are no restaurants in England. There are one or two eating-houses in London which have the air of restaurants, until a fair trial shows the hollowness of their pretensions. There are, or recently were, but two establishments in all great London that could even be mistaken for restaurants. And there is no nation in Europe in which there is so much bad cookery and so little good as in England. The saying is attributed to Ude, that cookery, when it is good in England, is better than it is anywhere else in the world. But where is it good in England? It is good in the houses of the very wealthy, and it is good in the great clubs. These, of course, exercise no appreciable influence over the general character of English cookery, which, therefore, remains very bad. One or two national dishes are generally well prepared—not the beefsteak, which is seldom good in England, but roast-beef and mutton-chops, which are nearly always good.

Not many months ago the English papers announced that a great restaurant was to be established in London, by a company formed under the Limited Liability Act, and under the name of "The Delmonico Company—Limited." The paragraphists then explained to their readers that "Delmonico's," of New York, was the greatest restaurant in the world; of an excellence of attainment equal to the best Paris restaurants, and of magnitude and splendor far surpassing the most important of them. These statements, which, very likely, the paragraphists only half believed, are nevertheless true. Their appearance in European journals is only a part of the wide-spread celebrity which, within the last four or five years especially, has been rapidly spreading wider. It would be impossible to write a full history of restaurants down to the present time without describing at length the rise and growth of this singular and most successful enterprise, the establishment of a perfect restaurant in a land where the cooking is almost uniformly bad. For our present purpose "Delmonico's" will serve as the living example of all that we have still to say about the nature of restaurants and what they ought to be. We are at no trouble to choose our example, for, while the restaurant in question seems to have taken rank as the most complete, and, on the whole, the best in the world, it is entirely without rival in America, and alone approaches perfection where all else is mediocre or worse.

If the history of the concern is ever written it will probably be interesting, for the growth of the undertaking from its commencement, in 1827, until now, has been contemporaneous with the progress of New York from a big town to a metropolitan city. New Yorkers do not know much about the history of their city, but it is not the less full of interest, and "Delmonico's" has grown with the city's growth, and strengthened with its strength, until each is full-grown and strong. The parallel cannot be carried far, for it is probable that good management of its affairs has had something to do with the success of the one, while the development of the other has been in spite of, and not in consequence of, such management as it has had.

The originators of the enterprise were two brothers Delmonico—Swiss—who had kept a confectioner's shop in Geneva, and who commenced the same business in William Street, New York, not far from the present restaurant building there. They also opened a café, and not long afterwards a restaurant. The latter change must have been about 1830, and it was in that year that the present head of the house, Lorenzo Delmonico, joined his uncles in their business. They were burned out in the great fire of 1835 removed to Broad Street, and there built the existing building at the corner of Beaver and William Streets, and began business there in 1837. For a time they also occupied the house 23 and 25 Broadway, where the Stevens House now is. We are coming to modern times now. Nearly every resident of New York will remember the old Irving House, which filled the block opposite Stewart's, on Broadway, between Chambers and Reade Streets. It was in 1855 or '56 that this was abandoned, and the central part torn down and replaced by a white marble building. The south wing, at the corner of Chambers Street, was taken by the Delmonicos, and it still remains in their possession. The large dining-room au premier in this building is still the pleasantest public dining-room in New York—exception being made in favor of one room, which is sometimes a dining-room, of which more hereafter.

At each of these places—at the corner of Beaver and William Streets, and the corner of Broadway and Chambers Street—a full restaurant business was and is done; but there was but little display and splendor at either, and the facilities for private entertainments were limited. In fact, some of the characteristic features of a great restaurant were still lacking. Perhaps the demand for such a thing was not sufficient in the immature New York of 1856, although then we thought New York a great city, and Delmonico's a capital restaurant. These things are comparative. No judgment is valuable and no statement accurate until the standard of comparison is known and understood.

In 1861 the restaurant was opened which is the most widely known. It is since the beginning of this, at the corner of Fifth Avenue and Fourteenth Street, that "Delmonico's" has become generally known outside of New York. At first, the corner house, formerly Mr. Grinnell's, contained the whole establishment, but after a few months the house next door was added, and the entire building, a hundred feet wide on Fourteenth Street, devoted to the purposes of a restaurant.

If there is any reader of this who has never dined or breakfasted at Delmonico's, he will like to know what the accommodations are. There are two large public dining-rooms, both on the ground floor (rez-de-chaussée, shall we say, when talking of a French restaurant?) and connected. Each of these is about twenty, or perhaps twenty-two, feet wide, and about seventy-five feet long. Back of these, also on the ground floor, is the café, an enormous room, perhaps thirty-five by an hundred feet. According to strict etiquette that fare only which is usually supplied by a café ought to be served in this room, to wit: coffee, chocolate, and tea; all wines and liquors and drinks of various kinds; bread and butter; raw oysters; boiled eggs, perhaps, or an omelet, if any one wants to spoil his morning's coffee with them; radishes, olives, cheese, and all the hors d'œuvres; ices. But the kitchen is near and the waiters obliging; you can have almost anything you want at the marble tables, if you are afraid to face the ladies in the dining room. Smoking is, of course, allowed here, but nowhere else in the building. Over the café is a room as large, amply lighted by large windows and skylight, smoothly floored—a ball-room all winter, but in summer, when balls are not and when the crowd is great in the evenings of those who seek ices and iced champagne, a dining-room. The pleasantest public dining-room, to us, is one so large that we are solitary and isolated in it, how near soever our nearest neighbor's table may be. The rest of the building is nearly all taken up with rooms for private parties; there are half-a-dozen pleasant little cabinets where not more than eight persons can be seated at table, and there are large rooms where stately dinners of two or three score guests are held.

There is skill in using a restaurant aright, just as there is skill in using a microscope: you shall work at your magnifier six months before you understand it; you may dine many times at the best restaurant, and not know how to dine there after all. There is no day that people do not sit down at Delmonico's tables and, if there are two of them, order roast beef for two and boiled potatoes and another vegetable for two, and then wonder what dessert (as they call it, meaning sweet dish) they shall have, finding no names on the carte of the pies and puddings they know. They are not only ignorant what to order, they do not know how to order, how to use the facilities offered them and get the full benefits of the cooks' labors. Two connoisseurs at the next table will order nothing which, like a joint, has to be cooked and kept hot; they order only those dishes which are freshly prepared at their order. And they order nothing "for two," but soup for one, fish for one, and so on, or very often leave it all to the head waiter: "A nice little dinner, Louis, and such and such wine;" or else to the waiter at their table, "such a soup and such a fish, and the rest as you please." They can trust the waiter to tell them if there is anything unusual in the carte du jour. To be sure there is a difference in waiters. And there may be a difference in the same waiter between his attendance on the gentleman who treated him politely and gave him a big fee yesterday and his attendance on an unprepossessing stranger. But the tendency at Delmonico's is towards first-rate attendance on all and at all times. We hasten to avoid the large subject of waiting on table and service in general, and hurry on.

The luxury attainable at a restaurant like this, ought to teach our people something about comfort. It ought to raise their standard. Hotel tables and private tables alike ought to be always compared with Delmonico's table—to their confusion, it is true, but to their bettering as well. Married people keeping house, unless they are very highly trained already, should dine at Delmonico's once a month at least, oftener if possible; vary their entertainment as much as seemeth to them good, and think of nothing but their dinner. If they do not learn something, it will be because they cannot learn from experience. The standard cannot be set too high. You need not grumble and scold because you know that the dinner at home is not as good as it might be; in fact, you ought to know that it is not as good as it might be (if that is the case), and you ought not to grumble and scold. Ignorance is very seldom bliss; it is only the painlessness of torpor. Know all about it, see where the fault is, notice how others avoid it, discover speedily that you might be very much better fed than you are without added expense. If you are the right sort of man or woman, you will be not a bit less comfortable yourself or less agreeable to others; but you will somehow help the matter, if your table can be improved, and influence others to advance the good cause of good living.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE existing understanding which, in the absence of an international copyright law between England and the United States, secured some remuneration to American authors abroad, is threatened with disturbance and a return to first principles—that is, the right of the strongest—from a very paltry cause. The bone of contention in the case is nothing more important than Artemus Ward's "Among the Mormons," though when we learn that one publisher, Mr. J. C. Hotten, has already sold eighty thousand copies of his shilling edition, even such ephemera assume a degree of consequence when viewed through trade spectacles. A rival publisher, S. O. Beeton, well known as an industrious compiler of some useful books of reference, had, or fancied he had, claims to Artemus Ward's lucubrations, and annoyed at being deprived of so salable a book, he has just issued advertisements announcing that he will reprint, in London, every successful American book, without any arrangement of, or benefit to, the authors, and in defiance of any courtesy or right that has been heretofore generally respected except by some professed pirates of the press. Even were the English law on the subject positive, instead of being deductive and inferential, there are so few single books that would pay the expense of a chancery suit, that Mr. Beeton may probably go on for some time unchecked. In the great case involving the copyright of Washington Irving's writings, between Mr. Murray and Mr. H. G. Bohn, it is understood that the expenses of each party were over £2,000, and a much larger outlay was impending, by the issue of a commission to collect evidence in America, etc., when the dispute was ended by a compromise, which left the legal principles at stake as far from being settled as ever. Mr. Beeton, of course, says his object is to make the state of things so bad that the United States will be forced to mend it, by the adoption of an international copyright, for the sake of their authors; but such general philanthropic professions have often been found before now in company with individual selfishness.

—Undeterred by previous failures, the publishers of Tennyson's poems announce an illustrated edition of "Enoch Arden," with designs by Arthur Hughes, one of the less known painters of the Pre-Raphaelite brotherhood. This, it will be noticed, is a year behind the accomplishment of a similar purpose in America, last Christmas having seen two rival illustrated editions of the same poem produced at Boston. In England, at least, Tennyson's writings have not lent themselves felicitously to artistic illustration. The edition of the "Poems" published in 1857, illustrated by Millais, Rosetti, Dyce, and others of the same school, was a long time in preparation, and great things were expected of it. So little, however, was the public taste fitted for its reception, that the book was a commercial failure in England, and in America the importer who had agreed to take a quantity actually threw up his bargain in disgust at the character of the illustrations, so little in accordance with the prevailing fashion of the day. A very large edition, ten thousand copies, was printed and issued at a guinea and a half. The unsold portion of them—as many, it was said, as eight thousand—finally came into the hands of Mr. Routledge, for about six shillings per copy, and were gradually disposed of at a reduced rate until now, when we believe the book has become scarce. The embellished edition of "The Princess," with Maclise's illustrations, was not more successful. A much smaller number of copies were printed than of the "Poems," but they met with the same fate, and fell into the hands of the buyers of "remainders," through whose mediation books that disappoint expectation are dispersed at a price more consonant with the public demand than the arbitrary rates affixed to them by the original publishers.

—A new literary adventure, in the shape of "The Argosy, a Magazine for the Fireside and the Journey," will start in London on December 1st. The distinguishing feature is the price, sixpence per number, each number to contain one hundred pages, and to be well illustrated. It takes the field in opposition to "The Cornhill," "Temple Bar," etc., that were lately considered miracles of cheapness at one shilling. A new serial story by Charles Reade will be a feature of the first volume. The publishers are Messrs. Low, Son & Co., well known for their connection with the American book market, and the liberal courtesy they have always displayed towards authors from the United States whose works they have republished, so that among the freight of "The Argosy" will probably be found some literary wares of transatlantic origin.

—The original text of the famous Asiatic traveller, Marco Polo, "Citizen of Venice, Privy Counsellor, and Imperial Commissioner of Khublai Khan," is now about being published at Paris for the first time, edited by M. Pauthier, the celebrated Oriental and Chinese scholar. It is curious that this should yet remain to be done for a book that has passed through sixty editions in the various languages of Europe, from 1496 to the present time and of an author whose information decided the purpose and enterprise of Columbus, while as late as the last century his authority sufficed for the great geographer, d'Anville, upon points in the geography of Central Asia, where no assistance could be gained from any other source. After Marco Polo had returned to Venice, like another Rip Van Winkle, from his twenty-six years' residence in the East, as a good citizen he soon began to take an interest in public affairs, and, fitting out a galley for the service of the republic, he was taken captive and thrown into prison at Genoa. Here he chanced to meet with a companion in misfortune, Rusticien de Pise, a literary man of Italian extraction, but whose books had been written in Northern French. To enliven the tedious hours of imprisonment, Marco Polo dictated his adventures to Rusticien in A.D. 1307, and after his return sent the original copy to Charles of Valois, son of Philippe le Hardi, King of France. Some manuscripts of the Imperial Library have been collated by M. Pauthier, one of which may be the original itself, and it is shown that the Italian text usually current, from which Marsden translated his edition, is an imperfect representation of the French, which is itself one of the most curious remains of the old and naïve language of France in the fourteenth century. The work will appear with every advantage of maps, geographical and historical commentaries, and remarkable confirmations of the credibility of the narrative, derived from Chinese sources by the learning of the editor.

—The most rising publishing firm in England at the present day is unquestionably that of Messrs. Macmillan & Company, of Cambridge and London. Their progress from obscurity to their present eminence is worth noting, because it is at once a consequence and a sign of the rapid growth of a party whose influence is daily increasing in theological and political questions. A few years since, the two brothers Macmillan were scarcely known beyond Cambridge, where they printed some of the mathematical text-books used in university tuition. The men since roughly classed together as representatives of the "Broad Church" party, and their friends and adherents in politics and literature, as Archdeacon Hare, Rev. T. D. Maurice, Charles Kingsley, Rev. J. Llewellyn Davies, Thomas Hughes, J. M. Ludlow, Archbishop Trench, etc., mostly members of the University of Cambridge, were then coming forward in various stages of development. They seem naturally to have selected publishers with whom they were familiar, and who have now become the accepted medium through whom their works are given to the world. With the number and increased circulation of their writings, Messrs. Macmillan's business enlarged, until they opened a first-class establishment in London, and even got a footing in the rival University of Oxford, by becoming agents for the publications of the University or Clarendon Press, taking the agency of it out of the hands of the High Church publishers, Messrs. Parker, with whom it had been an heir-loom for a century or more. One of the brothers having died, the firm now consists of Mr. A. Macmillan and a literary gentleman with whom he has lately connected himself. Their list of forthcoming books includes more of pure literary interest than the announcements of any other house. Among those intended to appear during the autumn are: "Popular Epics of the Middle Ages of the Norse-German and Carlovingian Cycles," by John Malcolm Ludlow, 2 vols. post 8vo; Francis Turner Palgrave's "Essays on Art" and edition of Shakespeare's "Sonnets and Songs;" "Defence of Fundamental Truth, being a Review of the Philosophy of John Stuart Mill," by Dr. James M'Cosh, author of "Intuitions of the Mind," etc.; "Spiritual Philosophy, founded on the teachings of the late S. T. Coleridge," by the late Joseph Henry Green, F.R.S., edited, with a memoir of the author's life, by John Simon, F.R.S.; the completion of Messrs. Aldis Wright and G. W. Clark's "Cambridge Shakespeare," the first attempt to exhibit critically the growth, formation, and grounds of Shakespeare's text; Miss Christina Rossetti's new volume, "The Prince's Progress and Other Poems;" "Popular Astronomy, a Series of Lectures," by G. B. Airy, Astronomer-Royal; the second volume of Donaldson's "Critical History of Christian Literature and Doctrine to the Nicene Council;" "The Bible Word-Book: a Glossary of Old English Bible Words," by J. Eastwood and W. A. Wright; Professor Huxley's "Lessons in Elementary Physiology;" and numerous further instalments of the popular "Golden Treasury" series, including "Milton's Works," by Professor Masson; "Cowper's Poems," by. Rev. W. Benham; "The Song-Book, Words and Tunes from the Best Poets and Musicians," by John Hullah; Sir Thomas Brown's "Christian Morals, Urn Burial," etc., one volume; and "Robinson Crusoe," by J. W. Clark. A number of other books of nearly equal moment might be mentioned without exhausting the announcements of the firm.

—A movement is on foot in New York, under the auspices of the N. Y. Historical Society, for securing to this city the library and historical collections belonging to Peter Force, of Washington. To any one familiar with researches in the history of America it is unnecessary to explain who Mr. Force is or what he has done. His title to the gratitude of his countrymen is the conception and execution of the great collection, published by the authority of Congress, "American Archives—consisting of authentic records, state papers, debates and letters, and other notices of public affairs, the whole forming a documentary history of the origin and progress of the North American colonies, of the causes and accomplishment of the American Revolution, and of the Constitution of government for the United States to the final ratification thereof"—in fifteen volumes folio. To those unacquainted with the work, it may suffice to say that it will rank in future ages among the national literary monuments, such as Italy, France, and Germany owe to the learned labors of Muratori, Dom Bouquet, and Dr. Pertz—such as England has in vain spent millions to procure (through the various record commissioners, etc.) without yet finding the man competent to its achievement. In Mr. Force the historical sense was developed at an early period in the nation's life, almost before even educated minds could understand his objects. He first was struck with the importance of the disjecta membra of history then perishing around for lack of any attempts to preserve them, and set himself the task of collecting such a body of authentic historical materials—favored in some sense by the neglect of the time—as no care, trouble, or expense could now procure. It is difficult to give even an idea of Mr. Force's vast library. The choicest articles of bibliomaniacal pursuit, the early tracts, travels, and narratives connected with the discovery and settlement of America, "now cheaply purchased for their weight in gold," are abundantly represented in the collection; but, in addition, it contains, what is never found on the shelves of the dilettante book-buyer, the solid material from which history is evolved—laws, reports, surveys, maps, legislative documents, periodical literature, and newspapers (the largest collection in the country), etc., etc., the fitting furniture for a public library, where the enquirer might dig and dig without fear of exhausting the rich historical placer. Some idea of the money value of such a library may be formed from the fact that one hundred thousand dollars in gold has been offered for it as a money-making speculation. It is a library that, if once destroyed, could never be replaced; if once dispersed, could never be re-assembled together; and its preservation in its integrity by the means now offered should be assured by the co-operation of all who understand the importance of historic truth in its relations both to the past and the future.

—The Homeric question seems to be one that it is impossible to exhaust. To judge from the number of publications, translations, etc., bearing on its discussion, it may be called the chosen field of English scholarship. A new book is announced on the subject, that in the wideness of its scope reminds one of Mr. Gladstone's work. It is "Homer and the Iliad, in Three Parts. Part I., Homeric Dissertations; Part II., The Iliad, in English Verse; Part III., Commentary, philological and archæological," by John Stuart Blackie, Professor of Greek in the University of Edinburgh, 3 vols. 8vo, to appear in January next. Prof. Blackie is well known as a caustic speaker of a gladiatorial turn, an energetic writer, and a scholar whose translation of Æschylus testifies to his command of metrical expression. Whatever faults his book may have it will certainly not be commonplace. Messrs. Edmondston & Douglas, of Edinburgh, are the publishers.

—Messrs. Blackwood & Sons, of Edinburgh, have in press the literary remains of Professor Ferrier, of the University of St. Andrews, whose "Institutes of Metaphysics" ably continued the Scotch traditions of mental philosophy. It is entitled "Lectures on the Early Greek Philosophy, and other Philosophical Remains of the late J. P. Ferrier, Professor of Moral Philosophy and Political Economy," edited by Sir Alexander Grant and E. L. Lushington. Professor Ferrier married a daughter of John Wilson, and edited the collected edition of his father-in-law's works. It is of his brother professor, Aytoun, who stood in the same relation to "Christopher North," that a story is told relative to the successful issue of his courtship. He took opportunity of "declaring his intentions" one morning when North was in his study, accompanied by the young lady. As soon as he had finished his explanation, whose purport the reader may conceive, and was awaiting with some natural anxiety the result, Professor Wilson, saying nothing, took up one of the numerous presentation volumes lying around, and tearing out a fly-leaf, with the inscription "with the author's compliments," pinned it on his daughter's dress and handed her to young Aytoun, without a word.

—One of the best general reviews of the whole circle of archæological science is given by the new Cambridge professor of archæology, Churchill Babington, in his introductory lecture, recently delivered before the university. Archæology itself he first defines as "the science of teaching history by its monuments"—history, not in the limited sense of dynasties and governments, but including "everything that concerns the domestic, the social, as well as the religious, the commercial, and the political life of all nations and of all tribes in the ages that have passed away." This definition is followed by a rapid survey of the field of action now daily advancing to the view, "from the rude implements and weapons of primeval man; the colossal structures of civilized men in Egypt and India; the strangely compounded palace sculptures of Assyria and Babylon; the exquisitely ornamented columns of Persian halls; the massive architecture of Phœnicia; the Gothic-like rock tombs of Lycia; the lovely temples, the incomparable works of art of every kind, great and small, of Greece; the military impress of the Roman conquest; the mediæval works of art in ivory enamel, in glass painting, as well as its glorious architectural remains, connecting the Middle Ages with our own time." A list of books of authority on the subjects indicated adds to the value of the lecture, which promises favorably for the zeal and learning of the new professor. A capital practical example of the lessons that he teaches is now in progress in England, where antiquarians are now at work revelling in the examination of a Roman city, whose site has probably never been touched since its destruction by the Saxon invaders in the fifth century. Archæologists have frequently cast a longing eye on the remains of the ancient Segontiacum or Silchester, in Hampshire, one of the largest Roman towns in Britain, with grass-grown walls nearly three miles in circuit. The site was, however, included in the estate of the Duke of Wellington, and the "Iron Duke" had no notion of his good old pasture land being broken up for such purposes. As long as he lived nothing could be done; but his son, the present duke, is more liberally inclined, and patronizes the explorations. A farm-house and a church are the only buildings within the walls, which include eighty acres, so that the whole area will be examined. The courses of the leading streets, etc., are ascertained, and excavations are laying bare the foundations of large public buildings. A faithful record of all "finds" is kept, and an account of the proceedings will be published by the rector of the parish. Such an opportunity for research is almost unique in Northern Europe, and enables the English antiquarians to boast of the "little Pompeii" at their own doors.

—The new volume of the "Bibliotheca Classica," directed by Professor George Long, will contain "Homer's Iliad," books 1–12, edited by F. W. Paley, M.A., whose editions of "Æschylus" and "Euripides" in the same series have met with general acceptance among scholars. "Plato," volume I., edited by W. H. Thompson, will follow; and the third volume of Prof. Conington's "Virgil," completing the "Æneid;" and the second volume of "Demosthenes," by R. Wharton, head master of Rochester School. Eighteen volumes of the "Bibliotheca Classica" have already appeared, and have caused the undertaking to be regarded as one of the most creditable achievements of classical scholarship in England. The second volume of Professor Long's "Decline of the Roman Republic" is also promised by the same house, Messrs. Bell & Daldy. The work has been announced for republication by Messrs. Harpers. Professor Long passed some years in this country as classical teacher at one of the colleges in Virginia, and while here published a treatise on Greek and Roman geography that is still occasionally met with.

We think that Señor Aguirre de Venero will scarcely create that impression upon the American public which so enthusiastic a philosopher must expect to produce by a book like this. There is not enough in the whole system of physiognomy to compel the world's serious attention, and when the science is reduced to a study of men's characters from their eyes, the interest of mankind must be also greatly reduced.

Señor Aguirre has written a very funny book, of which we find it impossible to make fun; for it is not in the least mischievous, and it is the fruit of too much sincerity and conviction to be wantonly ridiculed. The author tells us that his life has been devoted to the development of what he earnestly believes a science calculated to benefit men; and there is visible in every line of his work a most profound persuasion that he has succeeded. Let us, then, receive his book with the respect due to the labors of an honest man, however misdirected and however absurd in effect. It comes to nothing, of course, and it tells nothing that every one did not know before concerning the revelation of character through the eyes. Señor Aguirre supposes that he has systematized the means of knowing men by the observation of their eyes, and refers, with an egotism quite lost in the intensity of his purpose, to the proofs which he imagines himself to have alleged in support of his theories. It must be confessed that he has misapplied reading and a great experience of life to lay the foundation of a structure which necessarily tumbles to pieces as soon as built. He lacks originality in his observation, and method in his madness. The old conventional ideas of character attached to the different kinds of eyes are his, and he tries to establish them in various amusing ways. A great part of his book, for example, is devoted to study of the eyes of the men and women of sacred and profane history, as he finds them depicted in works of art, where the portraits are almost invariably ideal. Behold Aspasia's character, as our author derives it from the contemplation of her eyes:

"The great genius of this woman is revealed in her intellect; the sublimity of her mind, in the mild, elevated expression of her eyes; and the firmness, dignity, and energy of her character, in her stern but beautiful eyebrows.

"With such precious mental endowments, what wonder that sublime woman shone as she did, and attracted Alcibiades, Pericles, and Socrates to her rhetorical conferences?

"Pericles, being struck with admiration for the talent of this woman, decided on making her his wife.

"Aspasia was famous as an oratress and politician, and her house was frequented by all the philosophers of Athens.

"Eyes large and open to the full extent; contour and lines of the eyes splendid; brows high and of a severe cast; all of which traits indicate the greatness of the woman whose immortal name occupies a bright page in history."

Then, also, we have the character of the Psalmist:

"The physiognomy of this great king, and prophet, and sublime lyrical poet differs widely in all the portraits in which we have been able to study it: in some, the artists gave way to an exaggerated inspiration; others reveal a want of fire.

"Notwithstanding these faults, in themselves of so grave a nature, the delicate lines and contour have not passed undelineated in the beautiful eyes of the inspired and immortal author of the Psalms, which have been translated into all the known languages, and have engaged the pens of a Marot, a Malherbe, a Bacon, and a J. B. Rousseau."

Concerning "Lucretia, born in Rome, and died B.C. 509," we learn:

"There is in the eyes of this woman an expression of modesty and resignation which, united with her long, depressed eyebrows and chaste and serene forehead, plainly attests the truth of her tragic end.

"Having been dishonored by Sextus Tarquinius, and deeming death to be the only consoler for her lost purity, she caught up a dagger, and with it terminated her existence; for she could not conceive life without honor to be possible.

"In the midst of her delirium, and before she struck the fatal blow, the chaste Lucretia demanded to be avenged of the crime committed against her virtue.

"It is important to remark that she made avowal of the outrage to her husband and her father; and then took away her own life, so to carry with her to the tomb the beautiful name of chaste.

"The high qualities of Lucretia have been celebrated by Shakespeare, and furnished Arnault and Ponsard materials for successful tragedies."

And so on, through the catalogue of celebrities down to Orsini, the assassin. Even the Saviour is not omitted from the list of those studies, completing which the author turns to contemplate character in the eyes of the lower animals. Here he is not less amusing than elsewhere, nor less mistaken. He says of the squirrel:

"Eyes soft, quick, gay, sparkling, lively, and playful. The animal is docile, extremely susceptible of domestication, and without aggressive tendencies."

This may be all true of the squirrel's eyes, but it is all false of its character; it is often caged, but almost never tamed; so far from being without "aggressive tendencies," it is known to bite abominably on every opportunity.

* "New System of Physiognomony; or, The Art of Knowing Men by their Eyes. By M. Aguirre de Venero." New York: John F. Trow, printer. 1865.

The observer of eyes is sometimes deceived, as Señor Aguirre consents, and he relates a case in point:

"In order to avoid disagreeable mistakes, it is well to bear in mind the rapid advances made in certain arts in our days; by this means observers will be saved from such ridiculous blunders as that which I once made in the physiognomonic examination of a particular lady from her portrait. I had, however, the good fortune to attribute to the fair one the very good qualities she lacked, and so gained her good-will by flattering her self-esteem.

"But that circumstance did not lessen in any wise the gravity of my error. As soon as I saw the lady, I observed that I had studiously examined two eyes, whilst in reality she had but one, for the second one was of porcelain. I carefully examined her graceful eyebrows, little thinking they were due to the hand of art and the painter's brush.

"I also took into consideration her complexion, which had been freshened by the artist's carmine.

"And it never struck me that, at her age, her pearly teeth might well be artificial, which proved to be the case.

"In fine, I formed a judgment altogether ideal, in which not a single point was correct; and when I beheld before me the bitter reality, the original turned out to be an old woman with one sparkling, avid eye, like that of a hungry cat.

"I am not ashamed to confess the deception, for it taught me for the future that, especially in portraits, strict attention must be paid to everything that can be possibly false or artificial."

It is good in an age so much shaken with doubt to find a man of Señor Aguirre's firm convictions, and we regret that we cannot pin our faith to them.

THE NEW YORK CIVIL CODE.*

THE Constitutional Convention of this State provided, in 1846, for the appointment by the Legislature of Commissioners whose duty it should be "to reduce into a written and systematic code the whole body of the law of this State, or so much and such parts thereof as to the said Commissioners should seem practicable and expedient"—and also Commissioners to frame a code of procedure. Both commissions were duly appointed in the following year. The Practice Commission reported the Code of Civil Procedure in February, 1848, as subsequently enacted, and the Code of Criminal Procedure in January of the following year.

The Code Commission, after various changes in the persons composing it, was abolished in April, 1850. It was revived in 1857, by an act appointing Messrs. D. D. Field, William Curtis Noyes, and Alexander W. Bradford Commissioners, to continue in office five years and prepare codes of all law not considered by the Practice Commission. Their term of office was subsequently extended to April, 1865. The results of the labors of the two Commissions are now contained in six volumes: the Code of Civil Procedure (including the law of evidence), the Book of Forms, the Code of Criminal Procedure, the Political Code, the Penal Code, and the Civil Code. The Code of Civil Procedure has been long in use; the Civil and Penal Codes have been reported complete to the Legislature, and await its action.

In an "Introduction" to the Civil Code, the Commissioners briefly discuss the various objections usually made to all attempts at codification, particularly in States under the English common law; such as its impossibility, or its inexpediency—including under this head the difficulty of providing for all future cases, the uncertainty of a code, owing to its necessary conciseness, and its inflexibility. We regret that we have not space to quote entire their able examination of these various points, brief as it is, and as, in a document of this nature, it has to be. The advantages of a codification of the law they sum up as follows:

"Assuming that it is possible to have a body of written law in a convenient form, and in scientific order, containing the materials and framed in the manner already described, what benefits will it confer? In the first place, it will enable the lawyer to dispense with a great number of the books which now encumber the shelves of his library. In the next place, it will thus save a vast amount of labor, now forced upon lawyers and judges, in searching through the reports, examining and collecting cases, and drawing inferences from the decisions, and so far facilitate the despatch of business in the courts. In the third place, it will afford an opportunity for settling, by legislative enactment, many disputed questions, which the courts have never been able to settle. In the fourth place, it will enable the Legislature to effect reforms in different branches of the law, which can only be effected by simultaneous and comprehensive legislation. Thus, for example, the closer assimilation of the law of real and personal property, and the changes in the relation of husband and wife, as to property, cannot be effected by any other means so wisely and safely as by a General Code. The making of a code involves a general revision of the law. It is, indeed, in this way alone that such a revision seems practicable. The occasion is thereby afforded to look at the law of the land, as a whole; to lop off its excrescences, reconcile its contradictions, and make it uniform and harmonious. In the fifth place, the publication of a code will diffuse among the people a more general and accurate knowledge of their rights and duties than can be obtained in any other manner. This is an object of great importance in all countries, but more especially in ours. If every person can have before him, in an authentic form, the laws which are to affect his property, and govern his conduct, he can have an additional guaranty of his rights, and a better acquaintance with his duties. Here, more than anywhere else, all classes of citizens interfere in all the affairs of the state. They elect, directly, nearly all the officers who make, administer, or execute the laws. If in Holland, or in Germany, or France, a Civil Code has been found beneficial, much more is it likely to be beneficial to us."

It is, of course, useless for us to attempt, within the limits at our disposal, to discuss the merits of the codes. There are few men living who are competent to pass judgment of any value on such a work either in this country or any other; none, perhaps, nearly so competent as the Commissioners themselves, and their opinion of the result of their labors is expressed in their report to the Legislature last spring, but in terms too modest to afford the public much aid in forming a judgment upon the extent of its obligations to them:

"The Commissioners will not presume to think that in the preparation of the codes they have foreseen all the cases which can arise in the multifarious affairs of men, or that they have even collected all the general rules which have been announced from the bench in the past history of our law. Some may have been overlooked, some may have been omitted from a mistaken belief that they were obsolete or inapplicable to our present condition, or were contrary to other rules of greater importance that ought to be retained.

"All that the Commissioners profess is, that they have endeavored to collect those general rules known to our law which are applicable to our present circumstances, and ought to be continued. They trust that they have arranged these rules in a manner which will be approved by the scientific student, while it will help the lawyer and the citizen to an easier if not a better knowledge of the law. And they flatter themselves that for the unforeseen cases which are certain to arise there are general principles, rules of interpretation, and analogies which will serve as guides for judicial decision."

The degree of success which has attended the labors of the Commissioners can, of course, only be fully known when the codes have been for some time in actual operation. There are few persons—we may say there are none, either here or in England—who have devoted enough attention to the science of legislation to make their opinion about a code, framed for the use of either country, of very much value. So that the Commissioners are condemned by the very nature of their labors to await the result of actual experiment before they can receive their reward. The very first qualification which anybody who presumes to criticize the codes must possess is an intimate acquaintance—if we may use the expression—with the chaos of common aud statute law, out of which they have sought to educe order. This the general public does not and cannot possess. The lawyers who do possess it are, as a body, notoriously disqualified by the nature of their training, and the habits of mind which it induces, to pass judgment upon any attempt at codification. This defect is peculiarly marked in countries governed, as the United States and England are, by judge-made, or, as Bentham called it, "dog-law." Where precedents are made the subject of a life-long worship, any attempt to use principles to cover cases not actually arisen, gets to be looked on by the profession as little short of either folly or sacrilege. There are few men who have passed many years in the practice of the common law who are not overwhelmed by the difficulty of making themselves even imperfectly acquainted with it, so vast and various are the sources from which it is drawn. The decision of every judge is an authority; hundreds of judges have been deciding under it for a thousand years; almost every case that comes up, of course, differs more or less from all others, and the law which governs it has to be extracted from a great many hundreds of volumes of reports, by the aid of what Paley called "the competition of opposing analogies." These are pressed on one side or the other by counsel, as far as they can discover or think of them; the judge endeavors as best he can to extract a rule out of them to cover the case before him. If he has much difficulty in doing so, he bends the rule to meet the case by a "forced construction," or else he takes the case from under the rule by a "distinction." In any event, there results complete uncertainty as to what the law is. The decision when once made is theoretically binding in all subsequent cases presenting ever so little analogy. But, in reality, it is nothing of the kind, for reasons of which Bentham made an amusing list in his "Letter to the Citizens of the United States"—such as doubts as to the accuracy of the report, as to the fulness with which the facts were before the court, as to the degree of attention bestowed on the case by the bench and bar, as to the ability of the counsel who argued it, or as to the probity or learning of the judges who decided it, or as to the existence or non-existence of some other report of a case, published or unpublished, overruling their decision. The glorious uncertainty thus produced has been expressed in a saying very common at the English bar, that "in nearly every case which has been seriously debated under the common law, the judge might, without any damage to his reputation either for honesty or learning, have pronounced a decision directly opposed to the one he actually rendered." And Lord Loughborough used to say "that no cause ought ever to be abandoned as desperate." If all this be true, it would be difficult to conceive of anything more alarming. It can be readily understood that men who have passed the best years of their lives in groping their way through this dark and tangled brake are apt not only to lose all taste and all capacity for scientific legislation, but to doubt the possibility of anything of the kind. The lawyer who really loves the law, and practices it successfully either in England or America, without ceasing to love and cultivate the philosophy of law, is a rare phenomenon, and may set himself down as one of what the French call âmes d'élite.

Codification has been talked of in England for centuries, but neither the profession nor the Government have yet had the courage to face the task. Denmark, Sweden, Austria, Prussia, France, and Sardinia have long had codes, and yet there is not in existence in any country in the world such a store of materials for such a work as is to be found in the English and American reports. Bacon proposed, in a memoir addressed to James I., the consolidation and revision of the statutes; but nothing came of it. Cromwell made some attempts in the same direction—proposing to try the experiment in Ireland as on a corpus vile; but "the sons of Zerviah" (the lawyers), to use his own expression, "were too strong for him." In 1666, after the Restoration, a commission composed of the most distinguished lawyers of the day was appointed by the House of Commons for the same purpose, but it was dissolved after a few meetings and accomplished nothing. In 1796, a hundred and thirty years later, another commission was appointed and reported favorably, but here the matter ended. In 1825-6, Sir Robert (then Mr.) Peel inaugurated a reform by the consolidation of the statutes on theft, but it was only an experiment, and, despite the labors of Romilly and Mackintosh, the work went no further.

We have had a revision and consolidation of the statutes for some time in this and other States of the Union, but New York may claim the credit of having been the first to enter upon the work of codifying the common law. We have even reason to believe that the codes now before the public will stimulate the other States and England to enter upon the same task—first, by proving its practicability, and next, as we hope and believe, by proving its successful performance to be one of the greatest blessings that could be conferred upon the community. It would be hard to think of any one measure likely to do so much for security, industry, order, and mental and material progress as the infusion into legislation of the latest results of modern thought, and the adaptation of the whole body of the law to the popular comprehension. The work of the New York Commission has necessarily been one of immense difficulty. Not only has the field which they have had to traverse been of enormous extent, but they have been pioneers in a veritable wilderness. Mr. Field has been engaged in the work for eighteen years; all have had to devote to it every moment of the precious leisure snatched from arduous professional pursuits. Mr. Noyes fell by the wayside before he could witness the completion of the undertaking. The public may heartily congratulate his two colleagues upon the successful close of what, however it may answer the purpose for which it was intended, must always be regarded as one of the greatest enterprises of the century—"longæ finis, chartæque, biæque."

Speeches of Andrew Johnson. With a biographical introduction by Frank Moore. (Little, Brown & Co., New York.)—There is little to be said of the early life of our Chief Magistrate, except that it was spent in the three contiguous states of North and South Carolina and Tennessee, and received no other expansion outside of this limited area than was afforded at a slave-cursed capital in the days of Southern dominion. If Mr. Johnson had settled finally, like Mr. Lincoln, in a free State, it cannot be doubted that his strength would have been mortgaged to the service of freedom long before that service became synonymous with loyalty. He labored successfully for the adoption of the new constitution of Tennessee, in 1834, by which the free people of color were excluded from the polls, though they had voted hitherto. In Congress "he opposed the Smithsonian Institute, on the ground that it would be a burden on the public treasury, without commensurate good results;" opposed all appropriations to the District of Columbia, all increase in the salaries of Government officials; opposed the purchase of Madison's papers and Washington's Farewell Address. He supported the Mexican war both as right and as national, favored the admission of California and the protection of slavery. In 1844 he declared against the right to petition Congress on the subject of slavery. Up to Sumter time he was solicitous that slavery should not be harmed. The hatred of aristocracy, therefore, which his biographer represents as having animated and determined his political career, proceeded, it is plain, from no adequate appreciation of the cause of the social inequalities at the South, but rather from a galling sense of the inferiority of caste into which he had been born. He was not ashamed, when his means permitted, to rise to the grade of slaveholder, which had been at once the source of his own repression and the object of his tenacious warfare. He is not capable, even now, of relentlessly destroying what he lately called a "corrupt and damnable aristocracy," though he has the added motive which comes of their conspiracy against the national integrity; and in place of his senatorial avowal on March 2, 1861, that if he were President (as he is), he would have the leading traitors arrested (as he has had, to some extent) and tried for their treason (as he has not had them), and make them, if convicted (as they would surely be), "suffer the penalty of the law at the hands of the executioner"—in place of such an announcement, we now hear that the exclusions from his amnesty were merely nominal, designed to force the guilty parties to "sue for pardon, and so realize the enormity of the crime they had committed!" Against the insidious flattery of the humbled but not converted aristocrats of the South, Mr. Johnson exhibits no traces of former conflict with them, nor an inbred antipathy for them, nor even a warning instinct. How much, therefore, his biographer has mistaken his character, or he has mistaken himself, or has been altered by his sudden elevation, it may be difficult to decide; but error or change their seems to be, even when due allowance is made for the present restraints of office. Mr. Moore's volume is chiefly valuable for the half-dozen speeches which it contains. They are straightforward and sensible in style, often exalted in sentiment, but lacking in terseness. Their faults are probably concealed in delivery by earnestness of manner, but on ordinary occasions the orator would seem to be in danger of fatiguing his audience.

The Children in the Wood. Told in verse, by Richard Henry Stoddard Illustrated by H. L. Stephens. (Hurd & Houghton).—The success of Mr Stoddard's "Little Red Riding-Hood," last year, has encouraged a second venture in the same direction. Ninety-seven cantos compose the present pathetic—we were going to say ballad, but we fear must leave it unsaid. The author has produced a cross between an elevated poem and a juvenile ballad, which a grown person will find marred with simplicity, and a child with obscurity. Much of the amplification is devoted to a description of Yarmouth, where the cruel uncle dwelt, "in no manorial hall," but "in a plain and homely house," with "pollard willows set in front." The neglect of their relative leads the babes to wander among the taverns of the fishing town, and to meet "bold fellows" "whose faces bore the brand of Southern suns," which came of manning English guns against Spanish forts, but whose instruction in ornithology was not to be despised:

> "One held a parrot on his wrist,
> He brought from far Brazil;
> It pecked his hand. Said little Jane,
> 'It has an ugly bill!'"

Another set a bad example to the little ones by crying ("it was the captain spake") "Ho! Margery, wench, fill every can!" and drinking a health to Vice-Admiral Francis Drake. The retribution which overtook the unnatural brother is so overwhelmingly condensed in the last two cantos, that the catastrophe seems docked to suit the printer's requirements. Hence we have this appalling summary:

> "How fared it with the uncle, pray,
> Who thus his trust betrayed?
> His barns were fired, his goods consumed,
> His lands more barren made.
> His friends became his enemies,
> Or passed him coldly by;
> And in a voyage to Portugal
> One of his sons did die!
> "With tottering steps and thin gray hair,
> And features ghastly pale,
> He walked the world, a ruined man,
> Till he was thrown in jail;
> Where soon he died, and awfully,
> For near his pallet stood
> The phantoms of two children fair—
> The Children in the Wood!"

The pictures are a more successful attempt than the verses, and make up in color for what they lack in drawing. One of them reminds us rather forcibly of a popular engraving to which Mr. Stephens would lay no claim.

Life of Abraham Lincoln. By Joseph H. Barrett, Commissioner of Pensions. (Moore, Wilstach & Baldwin, Cincinnati.)—This work comprises three periods of composition—June, 1860, May, 1864, and July, 1865. The first two portions, it is obvious, were prepared in view of the Presidential elections which followed in the fall of '60 and '64, and the last was necessary to round out the biography. In this large but not clumsy volume of nearly 850 pages is contained a continuous sketch of the entire career of Mr. Lincoln, from his birth to the end of his immortal service. The compiler, in condensing so much of his subject's history as antedates his election to the Presidency, has preserved sufficiently the marks of that strong character which could never conceal itself. A few of the speeches in his memorable controversy with Douglas thus answer for the whole, though, except for considerations of space, the omission were to be regretted. The administration is copiously portrayed in its civil and military aspects, and here will be found almost every production of the President's voice or pen that would be valuable for reference, or would complete our appreciation of his action and temper during the four most oppressive years of office that were ever experienced by any human magistrate. The assassination is briefly narrated, and the book concludes with various selected tributes to the character of the deceased, and the compiler's own summary. While there are no serious faults in this "Life," we are not persuaded that it possesses extraordinary merits, as the publishers' circular pretends. It may be something that "Mr. Lincoln himself furnished for it all the material facts of his early life," but we have failed to discover what other advantages Mr. Barrett derived from "official relations" and "personal intimacy" with him. Certainly there have been more striking delineations of Mr. Lincoln's private habits, more elevated judgments of his nature and rank in the scale of greatness, than Mr. Barrett originates or appropriates. Witness the naïveté of his description of Mr. Lincoln's integrity as postmaster of New Salem:

"He discharged his duties well; and instead of even temporarily using any of the public money to supply his then pressing wants, he carefully laid up whatever belonged to the Government, from day to day, and at the final settlement he had a bag of coin, containing the proper amount, ready to be paid over" (p. 36).

In another place (p. 63) "the earlier struggles of Mr. Lincoln in acquiring his profession, the character of his forensic efforts, and the generous gratitude and disinterestedness of his nature" are illustrated by "the following incident, of which the narration is believed to be substantially accurate, from the pen of one who professes to write from personal knowledge." (The italics are ours.) But such "hedging" is not frequent with Mr. Barrett. As for the wood engravings, they are of little consequence, though the best seem trustworthy, as if from photographs. The print is good, and the price of the book moderate.

Golden-haired Gertrude. A story for children. By Theodore Tilton. (Tibbals & Whiting, New York.)—Mr. Tilton has an enviable reputation, outside of the lyceum, of being an excellent talker to children. We say enviable, because the power to interest the young by oral addresses is a very rare attribute of adult minds, which are apt now to underestimate and now to presume too much upon the intelligence of their hearers. To hit the golden mean—to cast aside the dignity of superior years and experience, and be born again, as it were, into the very thoughts, feelings, and desires of the age before you—requires either considerable mental effort or the liberal possession of what the phrenologists call "human nature." Mr. Tilton has shown beyond question that the process is altogether natural for him. He is gifted, too, in an eminent degree with the poetic, otherwise called the imaginative or constructive, faculty. Lastly, he is himself a father; and it is safe to infer that the pretty tale of Gertrude was rehearsed at home before its publication was ever dreamed of, and that the sense of the nursery was taken before its publication was consented to. We are inclined to approve the finding of such a court. The story is fresh, picturesque, and real-seeming, without a villain or bloody business of any kind, without a fairy, or a goblin, or a miracle, or sorcery, and with no greater improbability than that a king (no matter who or where) selects his queen from an humble station. No greater impropriety than Henry VIII. was guilty of, in Wolsey's estimation, when he took to wife Anne Bullen, "the late queen's gentlewoman; a knight's daughter, to be her mistress's mistress! the queen's queen!" Marked and praiseworthy care has been bestowed on the apparel and illustrations of this little book.

The Abolition of Slavery in Cuba and Porto Rico. By several Cuban and Porto Rican Abolitionists. (William C. Bryant & Co., New York.)—The object of this pamphlet is to expose the true character of those provincials whose appeals to the mother country in behalf of emancipation are industriously circulated here, but who are well represented by the "many Cuban planters," owning an aggregate of one hundred thousand slaves, who, we were recently told, had "signed a petition to the Cabinet at Madrid, requesting the abolition of slavery on the condition that the negroes must work for four dollars a month for ten years, and that afterwards they shall be for ever free." Against this and all other similar schemes our authors lift up an earnest high-toned protest, asserting that the real aims of the pseudo-abolitionists is to secure the interests of the slaveholders by riveting the colonies more firmly than ever to the metropolis, and so walling out the spirit of democracy, which, on the other side of the Gulf Stream, has redeemed a continent from chains. The arguments employed in the Antilles against immediate emancipation are identical with those in which the South abounded. They are met in this pamphlet with ingenuity and ability, and even with considerable freshness. Every position assumed in the text is fully supported by statistics in the appendix, which are all instructive and some even startling. What need, for example, of a commentary on this single line, to which we must confine our quotations?—"There are in Cuba 34,046 Chinese, out of which only 24 are females."

The Works of the Right Honorable Edmund Burke. Revised Edition. Vol. II. (Little, Brown & Co., Boston.)—The present volume contains, among other speeches, one on American taxation, delivered in 1774, at a date made memorable the subsequent year—the nineteenth of April; and one on moving resolutions for conciliation with America just a month before conciliation was rendered hopeless at Lexington. Also a letter to the sheriffs of Bristol on the affairs of America, in which, to meet the accusation of those who charged the opponents of violent measures towards America with encouraging rebellion, the orator declared that "general rebellions and revolts of an whole people never were encouraged, now or at any time. They are always provoked." Such may have been, as he pretended, the lesson of "the whole course of history" down to his time. To-day we could point him to a general revolt of a whole people which was void of all just provocation, and which was encouraged, not only unwittingly, but with the clearest foreknowledge of consequences. Such is the charge of history against the Democratic party at the North and its leaders, especially Franklin Pierce, both in and out of office.

The Magazines for November which we have thus far examined are:

Hours at Home.—The poem called "Grandfather's Pet" is the best thing in the magazine, and narrowly escapes unqualified praise; it is certainly to be liked for an unsolicited pathos of feeling, and a naturalness and simplicity of expression. The first stanza may be instanced:

"This is the room where she slept,
Only a year ago—
Quiet and carefully swept,
Blinds and curtains like snow;
There, by the bed in the dusky gloom,
She would kneel with her tiny clasped hands and pray!
Here is the little white rose of a room—
With the fragrance fled away!"

The conceit is pretty, but not fine enough to be used three times. Mr. Tuckerman's essay on Matthew Arnold, in the paper on "English Criticism," though good, does not add much to the current thought concerning that writer; nor has the author of "Female Education, as it is and as it should be," apparently much to say on the subject, though he does say a great deal. It is rather odd and rather sad that any one should think it necessary to write and print, at this day, sentiments like these: "The imagination must be cultivated. It is a noble faculty. Bonaparte said that imagination rules the world. The sense of beauty resides there." How the imagination of woman is to be cultivated, Mr. Spalding does not say, but probably by "drawing her faculties out of her," a process recommended in "Barnaby Rudge," by Old Willet, who was, no less than Bonaparte, a friend of the imagination. The brief essay on Macchiavelli, by Dr. Spencer, is vehement but not forcible, and is written in evident ignorance of the fact that the best Italian criticism of our day tends to show that Macchiavelli had no purpose to serve king-craft, but rather to reveal to the people the perversions of which any but republican governments were susceptible.

The Atlantic Monthly presents, on a higher plane, the equality and flatness of surface observable in Hours at Home. "Why Putkammer Castle was Destroyed" was because there was no other way of getting the ghosts out of it, though why the author should have been at the trouble to tell us this is not so clear. "The Rhyme of the Master's Mate" has the ambition to be poetry which was said to animate claret with regard to port: "A poor, thin wine, which would be port if it could." The poet requires seven pages to tell, in the person of the master's mate, the story of the battle of Fort Henry, and his art is to inform the rugged language of the personality assumed with poetic feeling: a splendid triumph, if achieved; a pitiable defeat, if, as in this case, success is wanting. Yet the poet's theory was just; there is fine poetry in the sentiment with which great events inspire certain rude natures, and when this sentiment is suffered to find vernacular expression, it has singular sublimity, and the poet has created an heroic image of our common life. It is possible that this is the rhyme of the master's mate, as he would have written it; but we suppose the editor of the Atlantic would hardly have printed the verses (which have nothing but their vernacular to commend them), if they had come to him in the mate's hand-writing, and not in Mr. Brownell's. "The Visible and Invisible in Libraries" is a paper of pleasant enough gossip, without much news in it, about quaint books and their abiding-places. "A Letter to a Young Housekeeper" tells that gentle spoiler of provisions how to cook certain dishes, and malignly counsels her to cheat her husband out of drinking coffee by giving him, gradually, weakened chiccory. The letter also informs us that its author generally gives two hours a-day to beating a bowl-full of cream into butter enough for supper, which shakes our faith in her wisdom. "The Peace Autumn" is the poem which you would naturally expect to find about this place in the Atlantic. We are not reading "Dr. Johns." "Rodolphe Töpffer" is a pleasant sketch of the life of a Swiss caricaturist, concerning whom many acquainted with his works will care to know something. Mrs. Stowe's paper for the "Chimney-corner" is wise and witty as usual, and touches a point which interests rich and poor women alike in a just argument against the foolish prejudice American girls feel toward taking domestic service. Many suffer from this prejudice, both among those whom it keeps out of pleasant homes, and those who would be glad to offer them in return for intelligent service. The writer of "Jeremy Bentham," in speaking a great deal of himself, incidentally tells much that it is pleasant to know of Bentham. "The Forge" is a story of no great promise. Mr. White's "Shakespeare" is reviewed in a friendly spirit. The remaining articles are: "A Farewell to Agassiz," "The Progress of the Electric Telegraph," "The Field of Gettysburg," and "Alexander Hamilton."

Harper's Magazine opens with a pretty-well-written account of an "Ascent of Popocatapetl," in which the author has the advantage of going over a but little beaten line of travel in days when travel penetrates to every sea and summit. "The Monks of Basle" is a poem of some promise in the opening lines, but at last of slight performance. Who would have thought, but for this poet, that the beautiful old legend of the ascetic monks who walked out disputing into the fields and fled from the sweetness of a bird's song, as from a snare of the devil, meant only that ——"he who Nature scorns and mocks

By Nature is mocked and scorned?"

Let it console the poet that his verses, after all, are not worse than others in the number. Mr. J. Ross Browne continues his sketches of life and travel in the Pacific country, and we are too grateful to him for past pleasure to say with how poor effect. But one of these ages the public will be tired of so much Browne to the acre, and will not be so good-natured as we are. "Anna Maria Ross" is an interesting history of the life of one of those good women who died as heroically in the care of the sick and hurt in our late war as any man who fell on the battle-field. Mrs. Stoddard's story of "The Chimneys" is full of fidelity to some phases of New England life, which she depicts perhaps better than any other writer; it is disfigured by none of her excesses of intensity, and is admirable in many ways without at all tending, in the plot, to shake our faith in Solomon on novelty. "Pozzuoli and Vesuvius" is another sketch of travel, and it is done in a sprightly way; but why so much about the author and so very, very little about Pozzuoli and Vesuvius? All things considered, Mr. M. D. Conway's article on "The Great Westminster Canvass," in which the scenes of the late elections for the English Parliament are portrayed, is the best thing in Harper for November. We have all been too much interested in the return of Mr. Mill and the other radicals not to care to learn something of the manner in which their political campaign was carried on, and Mr. Conway had the opportunity to know all of this, and has the art to tell it very entertainingly.

IL CRISPINO E LA COMARE.

THE first opera season of Mr. Maretzek culminated last week in the representation of a new comic opera, new to us, but which has delighted Italy for a quarter of a century, written by the brothers Ricci.

Luigi and Frederico Ricci were born at Naples, in 1808 and 1809 respectively, and early showed musical genius. They were educated at the Royal College of Music, where they enjoyed the instructions of the famous Zingarelli in composition as well as of Sigismondi. In 1828 Luigi wrote for the school-theatre his first opera, "L'Impresario in Angustie," and in the same year for the Teatro Valle, at Rome, "L'Orfanella di Ginevra," which obtained a brilliant success. The two brothers then wrote together with varying fortune. Continued failures induced them to separate their work; Luigi wrote "Chiara di Rosembergh," which failed at Paris at the carnival in 1833, though it succeeded everywhere else. Frederico composed "Rolla," "Corrado d'Altramurra," "Le Prigione d'Edinburgo," which was for a long time very popular in Italy, and "Un' Avventura di Scaramuccia," a broad comic opera which has always and everywhere met with success. He directed music at Madrid and Lisbon, was poor, wrote for his bread, could scarcely make both ends meet, but was finally invited to Russia, in 1851, by Field-Marshal Paskevitch. He wrote to a friend that "fortune for the first time smiled on him." When he started on his journey he repeated an air from his opera of "Rolla," "a nameless stone shall cover my grave," and smilingly said it would be his own fault if it did—a prediction soon realized, for after a short success in Russia he died of apoplexy in the post-carriage between Warsaw and St. Petersburg. Luigi survived him, and became the director of the opera at Trieste, but was seized with insanity and died in December, 1859, in the mad-house at Prague. "Il Crispino e la Comare" was one of the joint products of the two brothers. Played for a long time in Italy, it was brought out successfully in Paris last winter, and is now being represented there at the Théâtre des Italiens. It is founded on the old story of a fairy who makes of a poor man a rich doctor, and which was a theme often handled by the marionettes and by the comic theatres of Italy. The old German version of the story can be found in Grimm's "Tales." The writer of the libretto, Francesco-Maria Piave, had little to do but to put this old story in verse, adding a little under-plot, which is mostly cut out in the version presented here.

Crispino Tacchetto (Rovere) is a poor cobbler who is pursued by his creditors, and by the suitors of his pretty wife, Annetta (Miss Kellogg), and who finally resolves upon drowning himself. A fairy (Miss Ficher) rescues him in time and promises him life and wealth, and that she will make him a great doctor. His medical theory is to be very simple: if the fairy does not appear, the patient will get well; if she makes her appearance, the sick man will surely die. Crispino comes home and puts up a sign as a doctor, and actually cures a man given up by the other doctors. This brings him into conflict with two leading physicians, Mirabolano (Bellini) and Fabbrizio (Marra), and gives rise to a very comic passage. Prosperity is too much for him, and he becomes haughty and miserly. He ill-treats his wife, who is innocently entertaining some guests with a banquet and a song, and even threatens the fairy. In punishment for this he is carried by the fairy through the floor into her subterranean abode, and there sees himself near death. The room is suddenly illuminated with lamps which mean so many lives. He sees that his wife's lamp has more oil than his, and proposes to pour some out into his own. The fairy prevents him, and shows him in a mirror his wife and children praying for his safety. She then accepts his repentance and restores him to earth, where he awakes in his own house as if from a dream. Such a story does not present opportunities for very great music, but this is light and pleasing as a whole. It has a certain old-time flavor about it, and makes one think of Paisiello and Cimarosa. The school in which the composers studied did not recognize the existence of Rossini, or of the loud and full style of instrumentation. The orchestration is confined principally to the stringed instruments, with the wind instruments in small proportion, and in accordance with the musical laws then received and implicitly obeyed by such men as Sigismondi.

The opera can hardly be compared to "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," and even falls much short of Donizetti's comic operas. The airs are not infrequent; though pleasing, they are of very moderate merit, and have nothing fresh or piquant about them. The accompaniment is nervous, and seldom rises above a mere support to the voice; sometimes, as is allowable in comic opera, it is altogether wanting, and the recitative degenerates into talking. The play begins at once, without an overture. The first thing that is noticeable is a romanza for the tenor in common time. This is to us the most pleasing piece of the whole opera, and we very much regretted that it came too early in the opera to be particularly attended to, and that Irfre was not able to make himself heard in it. It is a pathetic air, and admits of much expression. The modulation of the accompaniment in the first and third bars is very good. Next is a canzonet sung by Miss Kellogg with a very good appreciation of its meaning and of the part. A concerted piece follows of slight merit. There is a recitative and aria by Fabbrizio, which has one pleasing passage, commencing

> "Siate pur vedove,—siate zitelle,
> E brutte e belle—volete amor."

The scene between the fairy and Crispino is musically almost null. There are three or four lines sung by the fairy that have a certain solemn beauty, but the rest is a very hurried and very comic recitative. More ought to have been made of the part of the fairy; there are abundant opportunities for some weird, slow music suitable to a supernatural being, and it would have been a fine contrast to the rest of the work. The act closes with a duet between Annetta and Crispino in a quick dance measure. This was so well sung and acted as to be encored and applauded, though in itself not deserving it. The second act has an air in six-eigh ttime for soprano, "Io non sono più l'Annetta," which is light and lively, and a duet, followed by a sextet which is quite well managed. The trio in the third act between Mirabolano, Fabbrizio, and Crispino makes a better point than anything else. It was well sung and very well acted. Then follows an aria, "Piero mio, go qua una fritola," which, with its Venetian dialect and its piquancy, is very well suited to the character of the rich but vulgar Annetta. It deserved more attention and applause than it obtained, though we think a little more expression might have been put into it by Miss Kellogg. The remainder of the opera has nothing of much value, save a beautiful but very short prayer, and a sparkling and pretty waltz, "Non ha gioja in tal momento." We think we have noticed all the movements of any importance. The tenor air in the first act, the trio in the third, and the "fritola" song, are the pieces that will please the most and longest, and that have the most in them.

At the performances last week the singing was, with the exception of Irfre and Ficher, all good, and sometimes excellent. The acting was especially good. Miss Kellogg has created the character of Annetta, and has taken a very correct view of the lively ballad singer and the sometimes vulgar grand lady. She acted consistently and intelligently throughout. Bellini proves himself to be a good comic singer, a thing he showed signs of last winter in "Fra Diavolo." His rendering of his part of the trio was very fine, and his acting throughout deserving of much praise. In the famous trio he and Rovere contested the palm of excellence. They both know just how far to go. Rovere is the best humorous actor that we have ever seen on that stage. His motions and expressions and utterances are all funny. We were much struck with the way in which he smoothed off the encore, as if it was a part of the opera, by saying to Bellini, "Io non ne ho inteso ninguna parola" (I did not understand a word you said), and requesting him to sing it over again. The encores were all acted with more spirit than before, and always with telling variations. The subordinate parts were well filled. Mr. Reichardt did very finely.

This opera was shamefully put upon the stage. Words are inadequate to express the meanness and carelessness of the scenery and decorations. The first scene is laid in Venice. Now we know, from what we saw a few nights ago in "Lucrezia," that there is scenery belonging to the Academy which will convey a faint idea of that water-city. This was not used; at the back we see high, steep mountains, far too high and precipitous, and crowded by too many castles to be taken for the Euganean Hills, which can only be seen on a clear day with the setting sun behind them. There are no canals, no gondolas, no St. Mark's, or any of the well-known signs of Venice. A plaza is represented containing a café, an apothecary's shop, an inn, and two dwellings. None of them are Venetian in character. The second scene should represent a deserted place, not surely a thick forest, in Venice too, with a well singularly placed among the trees, with a vine-covered curb. The deserted place intended in the play was probably some small corner shut in by high walls, paved with broken stone, and with an old, carved marble well-hole in one corner. In the third act we are told that we see the interior of an apothecary's shop. If that is so, they had strange pharmacies in Italy in those days. We behold what seems to us that very roomy and strange study of Faust, with its huge stuffed crocodiles, and its skulls, its rows of jars and gallipots labelled "Sanguis Nig." and "Elixir." These few shelves and the specimens are all that it contains; no boxes or bags, no scales or counters, no furniture of any kind except a rickety table with pen and ink, and three chairs. Next we are shown a rich apartment in the interior of Doctor Crispino's house. Very sumptuous, no doubt, with its panelled walls, and with a small table, with seats for six or seven, standing at the back. The table-cloth is dirty, the crockery of the cheapest description, and the whole entertainment such as Annetta would probably have given in her early poverty. The second evening this was better; the table-cloth had been washed, and the crockery was replaced by copper that seemed to have been once gilt. A small company of very plainly dressed people are ushered in, and look at the table with an expression that would seem to imply that they were not quite sure whether they wanted to sit at such a table. They cannot all sit down in any case. So some stand up, and all look wretched, and drink imaginary wine out of huge goblets.

The last act presents us with the subterranean dwelling of the fairy. It is a stone-built room in the midst of a cavern. Two tall cupboards, adorned with green snakes, stand on each side of what is supposed to be a mirror. Two huge statues stand in front—Time on the right and Justice on the left; both ugly, and very painty. Somehow the statues in the Academy are never white, but of some new kind of marble of a French-grey color. Suddenly vases of lights appear, and the cupboards open, displaying a singular mechanism of gas-fixtures, of no beauty and of not the slightest possible use. The wife and children of the cobbler are then seen in the mirror at prayer. That is a very pretty effect, and well done when the curtain will run smoothly, but praying is usually done in a kneeling and not a sitting posture. Then comes the grand transformation scene, when the lights go out, and the room changes to the house of the cobbler. The whole thing is poorly conceived, and very bunglingly managed. The carpenter would improve a little by study of the Bowery stage even. But of this scene the management is very proud, and mentions it in the bills. There may be some excuse for bad scenery in the bad construction and great size of the stage, but there is no excuse for a lack of effort to make the most of available means. The proscenium opening of the stage is by far too high, which necessitates the employment of painted curtains, and spoils all the effect of the scenery. The wings on either side of the boxes are set too far back, and are too large. The stage should seem set behind a frame, as in the Brooklyn Academy, and not, as here, a continuation of the body of the house. But, with care, even the difficulties arising from construction could be obviated. At all events, we expect more care given to the scenery than in any of the minor theatres. The reverse is the fact.

In "Il Crispino" we are willing to accept the costumes as correct (though we very much doubt it), because they were consistent with each other and were very good in color-effect. That is generally too little regarded. The principal characters here were very effective with their black velvet and their red brocade coats, their flowered silks, and their white tie-wigs, and looked as though they might have stepped out of one of Fichel's pictures. The chorus were, as usual, very shabbily and improperly attired. We hope the improvement last week will be a permanent one, as we were shocked, a few nights ago, to see in "Traviata," the scene of which is laid in Paris at the present time, all the men in the costume of the period of Charles I., while the ladies had on the latest style of dress and ornament.

In spite of all drawbacks and faults, "Il Crispino e la Comare" is a success. This is principally due to the acting. The play without the music would be almost as effective. The audiences each night were attentive, appreciative, and enthusiastic. More the manager cannot desire.

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW PLAY AT WALLACK'S.

In this world of comedy lives a silly old woman with a weak, vain daughter of her own, and a beautiful and discreet daughter of her husband's. This silly old woman has a passion for medicine and offers; doses her husband and servants constantly with the one, and constantly contrives the other for her daughter, while she brutally snubs her step-daughter. Twice, with no visible reason that the spectator of the scene can understand, she gives her daughter away to men who have not asked for her, and once helps her to elope with an adventurer who supposed her an heiress. These interesting people are much visited by a fair, traditional being, whose father, dying on the field of battle, left a note in his pocket ordering her to marry Feargus Daly, a traditional Irishman, and son of the traditional friend of this traditional dead parent. As happens sometimes in real life, the young lady hates her betrothed before she has seen him, and, as often happens in comedy, loves him when they meet, and will evidently marry him in the last act. She is a fascinating creature, with sweet traditional ways of bullying the men, and exposing her conduct to misconstruction by every imaginable device which beings in this world would avoid. Acquainted with these traditions is the legend of the young man whose legendary uncle has made a legendary will cutting him off without a shilling if he does not marry a lady with ten thousand pounds (dear, familiar sum!) before he is thirty; and this legend is resolved to wed the silly old woman's step-daughter, who has not so many pence to her portion. At last an idiotic good genius, in the white hair, red face, and drab trousers expressive of the qualities of philanthropy, prevails on the silly old woman's husband to refuse her medicine and to give his daughter to the legend just before his time expires for marrying before thirty a lady with the familiar sum of ten thousand pounds, which the idiotic good genius (being a non compos retired rich from the tallow business) bestows upon the snubbed daughter of the silly old woman's husband. It follows from these circumstances, which cannot be strange to the reader, that in the last act the four young people wed, and the well-known flunkey marries the habitual serving-maid, and all, together with the silly old woman's husband, assist at a triumph over the silly old woman and her husbandless daughter and her wifeless son—she has a son, a cretin in the service of his country, with nothing of him but the eye-glass, the velvet coat, and the yellow whiskers which we know, and a habit of tottering through life on tiptoe.

All this is supposed to take place at a watering-place in England, and, as we inferred from remarks dropped by some of the characters, it is supposed to take place in one day. It is, therefore, a study of contemporary English society, and in that light is certainly very interesting. In this play, we behold a state of things which may well content us with our own civilization. There no one is actuated by any comprehensible motive except the sole purpose of marrying for money. It is curious to see with what ease these modern English people deceive themselves and one another, and one at last begins to understand why there was such general sympathy among them with our late rebellion; we behold them snared with as visible pretences and as shallow artifices as any employed to popularize the cause of the South among them. They have good qualities, however, and are very patient; they endure, all of them in this play, more insult and contumely than we had thought human nature capable of bearing; and it is curious to find that, with all the supposed severity of English deportment, young ladies suffer themselves to be embraced before they are made love to, and have habits of putting their hands on gentlemen's mouths and telling them to go away. Here we see, also, that two impudent adventurers may offer every impertinence to a lady in her own drawing-room, and not be kicked down stairs; while old gentlemen, retired rich from the tallow-trade, rather relish being alluded to as "persons," and addressed as "honest fellows," when these attentions are offered by people of gentle blood and breeding, on occasion of morning calls at their houses.

In fine, this new play of "The Needful," which a "Celebrated London author" has been good enough to bestow on our generation, and which was given to the New York public for the first time at Wallack's on last Thursday night, is a sum of melancholy absurdity, which nothing but superb scenery and all but faultless acting could render sufferable. We make the manager our compliments on the manner in which he has put the play on the stage, and offer him our condolence that he should have felt forced to put it there. In material and texture, shoddy itself is not more absolutely and worthlessly second-hand than this work of the "Celebrated London author." It represents no life that human beings ever led in the world, and only reflects the dullest and stupidest fiction to be seen on the stage. Its incidents are stale tricks, to be expected from the beginning; its characters are feeble coins of burlesque, with no claim to existence, and of their own motion could not pass from one action to another.

There was a large house to see the play, and the spectators behaved with angelic fortitude and patience, only a few persons, of delicate constitution, probably, leaving at the close of the second act, when the whole plot, such as it was, was developed, and nothing was left for the actors but to aimlessly walk through and talk through the three succeeding acts. This the poor souls did with a sweetness and resignation hardly less admirable than the conduct of the spectators; they must have been frightfully bored, but they did not spare themselves nor us. Their acting alone saved the piece; and a generous applause from the audience hailed the beautiful new scene of a pier on the Isle of Wight, which was so well painted that it sustained fainting nature throughout one of the longest, weakest, most witless acts of the interminable, stale, foolish play.

WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY.

NEW ILLUSTRATED EDITION.

Large Paper, Imperial folio.

The undersigned will issue during the autumn a fine edition, on large paper, of the above recent edition of Webster's Dictionary, to be sold to subscribers only. It is to be printed on fine sized and calendered paper from Grant, Warren & Co.'s celebrated Cumberland Mills; the size of the untrimmed page, 10 by 15 inches, like the specimen sheets presented. It will be in the best style of the Riverside Press, Mr. Houghton having carte blanche for that purpose. The number to be sold in this country is limited to two hundred and fifty copies, with the right reserved to the publishers to supply not exceeding twenty-five or thirty copies abroad. The work will be sold to subscribers only, in two volumes, paper covers, at $25 per copy, payable on delivery.

As the Dictionary is now placed in a permanent and perfected form, many gentlemen have expressed a wish for copies of an edition like the above, to correspond with other works in their libraries, and often, especially, for one with large margin, for the purpose of annotations—particularly convenient in a work of reference like this.

As we deem it desirable to place copies of this fine edition in the hands of as many gentlemen of position and influence through the country as practicable, subscriptions will be limited to one or, at most, two copies to an individual.

Specimen pages of the work will be shown, and subscriptions received, by Messrs. Lee & Shepard, 149 Washington Street, Boston; Hurd & Houghton, 401 Broadway, New York; J. B. Lippincott & Co., 715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia; J. W. Bond & Co., 86 West Baltimore Street, Baltimore; S. C. Griggs & Co., 39 and 41 Lake Street, Chicago; Robert Clarke & Co., 55 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati; Keith & Woods, S.-W. corner Fifth and Olive Streets, St. Louis; or at the subscribers', in Springfield, Mass.

The Pittsburg Christian Advocate says: "The best paper for children, published in this great country of ours, is The Little Corporal. It is a gem in the catalogue of monthlies."

Forney's Philadelphia Daily Press says of it: "Judging from the appearance of the two numbers before us, The Little Corporal is destined to become the great children's paper of America."

"A NEW CHILD'S PAPER.—We have received two copies of The Little Corporal. Judging from these specimens, it is the cleverest thing of its kind yet realized in America. "We cannot say too much in favor of this beautiful paper."—Bryan [O.] Union Press.

"It already excels every children's paper we know of in this country."—Chicago Evening Journal.

"The children will be better and happier from reading it."—Henry [Ill.] Courier.

"Indeed, there is no paper of the kind published that approaches it as a juvenile journal."—Poughkeepsie Daily Press.

THE LIFE OF

MICHAEL ANGELO.

BY HERMAN GRIMM.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN BY FANNY ELIZABETH BUNNETT.

Two Vols. Crown 8vo, $5 00.

"We can most accurately characterize it as a history of painting, sculpture, and architecture in Italy in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries—great times, in which Titian and Giorgione, Michael Angelo and Raphael, were rivals. The book also treats of Angelo as a poet; and is particularly rich in his correspondence, much of it not previously published. Each volume is enriched with an appendix, into which the translator has gathered a variety of notes, explanations, corrections, and illustrations."—Philadelphia Press.

It is throughout a faithful piece of literary labor, into which the author has put his entire heart. The subject is evidently congenial to his taste, and he has wrought upon it with that unflagging zeal which genuine interest alone can give. He is nowhere careless, nowhere superficial: when we have laid down his book, we have the assurance that we know everything about the life and labors of Michael Angelo that the most patient research, the most careful and conscientious investigation, can find for us. And we have rarely had occasion to differ with Grimm in his estimate of Michael Angelo as an artist: at least our difference has never been in kind, but only in degree. We do not consider that he has, on the whole, overvalued or overpraised his subject. And his speculations on art, if not always sound, if sometimes a little strained, are always ingenious and the result of reflection. His remarks at the close of the work on the great and growing importance of literature as compared with art, and the causes of it, are original and striking.

"And our author has a proper comprehension, and gives his readers a proper impression, of the moral greatness of Michael Angelo, and it is from this source that no small portion of his fame and influence is derived. For his character was equal to his genius. One of the greatest of artists, he was also one of the greatest of men. There was that in his life which was higher than the highest of his works. A painter, a sculptor, an architect, and a poet, he was as a man singularly free from the defects and infirmities to which the temperament of the artist is exposed. He was rigidly abstemious in his habits, of strict purity in his relations with women, wholly indifferent to money, of lofty independence of character, and with an insatiable love of labor. The biography of such a man, so amply and copiously told, has a moral value independently of its worth as a contribution to the history of art. All men are not qualified to judge of Michael Angelo's merits as an artist, even if they had the opportunity to study his works, but all can comprehend the moral grandeur of his life, and to feel this we have only to read the work before us."—Boston Advertiser.

PIONEERS OF FRANCE IN THE NEW WORLD.

BY FRANCIS PARKMAN,

Author of "The Conspiracy of Pontiac."

Crown 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

"A narrative which has all the animation, variety, and interest of a romance, and to most readers it will be as fresh and novel as a pure creation of the imaginative faculty. . . The leading, the indispensable merit of thoroughness of research and faithful investigation of all sources of information—that excellence without which, at this day, no felicity of style can secure for an historical work any permanent place in public regard—this volume possesses in the largest measure."—The World.

"Mr. Parkman is already known to fame as one of the most accomplished writers who have made the early history of their country the subject of deep and continued study, assembling for its illustration all the sources that the private relations of discoverers and travellers or that the archives of the parent states in Europe can supply. Mr. Parkman's book is an indispensable supplement and companion to all the existing histories of the United States."—New York Times.

"Mr. Parkman has that prime merit of an historian, the conscientious study and comparison of original documents. He has that hearty enthusiasm which gives warmth and life alike to subject and reader, making his books wholesome reading for both old and young."—North American Review.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, is pursuing a journey through the South. His letters appear every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW,
JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL,
JOHN G. WHITTIER,
SAMUEL ELIOT (Ex-President Trin. College, Hartford), PROFESSOR TORREY (Harvard),
DR. FRANCIS LIEBER,

Improvements in Piano-fortes.

One of the simplest and most truly valuable improvements yet made in the Piano-forte is that invented and patented by Mr. David Decker, of the firm of

in this city. By correcting the only imperfections arising from the use of the full iron-plate, and that, too, by not detracting in the slightest degree from its many positive advantages, the Messrs. DECKER have developed in their instruments a tone at once admirable for its purity, fulness, prolongation, and sweetness, and the high estimation in which their improvement is held is well shown in the rapidly increasing business of their firm.—Tribune.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

THE cholera has at last reached our shores, or rather its victims have, which some doctors say is the same thing, while other doctors say it is not—that it will not spread until certain "mysterious atmospheric conditions" are present. What these "mysterious atmospheric conditions" are, nobody knows. What we do know is, that on every occasion on which it has reached this country, its advent was preceded by the death of persons in a ship on their way here, and that, soon after the arrival of the ship, people began to die of it on land. The use of talking about the presence or absence of "atmospheric conditions," of whose nature nothing is known, and of which nobody can detect the indications, is not very apparent. The truth is, that the cholera is now here; that cases of it may henceforth be looked for, in greater or less numbers; that dirty, ill-fed, ill-clad, badly-lodged people, drunkards, people living in filthy streets and near cesspools, drains, and nuisances will die like cockroaches, and even some people who enjoy every possible physical advantage; and that the best defences against it are good health, cheerfulness, good food, temperance, fresh air, and a plentiful use of the bath. All beyond this is pure speculation, and will not save a single life. It is some satisfaction to know, also, that cowards and selfish persons are, next to dirty persons, its favorite victims. Every preparation has been made for giving it full swing in New York, which is nearly as filthy as the Asiatic towns from which it comes. It is awful yet comical to learn that the Board of Health, which at such a crisis ought to reign supreme, is such a disreputable body that, nobody having the power to adjourn it if once organized, the Mayor is afraid to call it together.

THE Commissioners of Health are preparing an address to the public, in which, it is said, they will urge upon it the importance, on the approach of the cholera, of "assuming a horizontal position, and freeing the mind from anxiety." This is good advice, but superfluous, we imagine. A man lying on his back waiting for a possible attack of the cholera will, doubtless, do his best to be jolly, but whenever he succeeds in dismissing care he may safely sit up.

THE controversy between Thurlow Weed and Lucius Robinson has been raging with unabated fury. The question whether Mr. Weed "spurned" Mr. Robinson's hand having been found incapable of settlement, has been remitted to what Dickens calls "the illimitable prospective." The equally important question of the extent of Mr. Weed's private fortune, and of where he got it, is now before the public. Mr. Robinson says it was largely drawn from whiskey speculations of an improper character. Mr. Weed says it was not, and alleges that Mr. Robinson is a pluralist, an "oil speculator," "a deserter," and several other bad things. It would be impossible to conceive of anything more degrading or better calculated to disgust all decent men with political life, than this controversy as these two personages are carrying it on, and there is matchless conceit in the way in which they force their squabbles on the public attention.

ON the 30th of September the public debt was officially announced to be $2,744,947,726; on the 31st of October we now learn that it was $2,740,854,759, or quite four millions less. This reduction has been accompanied by a withdrawal from circulation of more than forty-four millions of the legal tenders.

THE dinner given at Delmonico's by Sir Morton Peto was sufficiently public to make it no impropriety to say that it was perhaps the greatest triumph of the gastronomic art ever witnessed. Everybody acknowledged that no such entertainment would be possible in any other capital in the world. In London it would have been out of the question to attempt it. The great dinners at the "London Tavern" are mere "feeds" compared to it. Dinners as well cooked are, perhaps, often eaten at some of the clubs on great occasions, but not by as many people at once. In Paris there is no restaurant capable of seating and serving half the number of persons assembled at Delmonico's with nearly the same attention, elegance, and profusion. It is safe to say that two hundred and fifty persons were on Monday week dined as well and as comfortably as any party of six have ever dined, and that there was, neither in the waiting, nor in the cooking, nor in the wine, nor in the table appointments, the slightest indication that the resources of the great restaurateur were any more severely tasked than they are on any other day in the year. The successful accomplishment of such a feat is the most striking indication that has yet been afforded of the rapidity with which New York is gaining on the cities of Europe in many of the arts which have hitherto been supposed only capable of successful cultivation in the old societies.

MR. GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS favored the Democracy in Brooklyn, on Saturday night, with his views as to the duty of President Johnson and of the people of the United States, but notably as to that of Mr. McPherson, the Clerk of the House, in the matter of putting the names of the Southern members on the roll. He says that Mr. McPherson's office office is a "ministerial" one; that, therefore, although the law under which he acts directs him to put on the roll the names "of such persons only whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States respectively, or of the laws of the United States," yet he has no right to exercise his judgment as to whether anybody presenting himself for admission to Congress has been so elected or not, so that, according to Mr. Curtis, he is bound to enrol everybody who presents himself with any paper purporting to be "credentials." He may not even "look into the credentials." Therefore, under this ruling, a hundred men might present themselves with forged papers; Mr. McPherson would be bound to enrol them, and they would actually be entitled to take part in the organization of the House, and vote on the question of their own eligibility.

THE activity of reconstruction is heightened by the approach of December. The President has been particularly prominent during the past week, in pointing out the path of return to the reforming States. Thus, in very strong terms, he instructed the Georgia Convention to repudiate every dollar of debt contracted in aid of the rebellion, and allowed Mr. Seward to telegraph that "the President of the United States cannot recognize the people of any State as having resumed the relations of loyalty to the Union" until they have repudiated these debts. He also directed the Secretary of State to telegraph Gov. Marvin that the Florida Convention must ratify the anti-slavery amendment of the United States Constitution as an indispensable condition of reunion. He sent a despatch to Gov. Murphy, encouraging Arkansas to proceed with its present civil re-organization; for "all the aid in the power of the Government will be given in restoring the State to its former relations." The Georgia Convention abolished slavery on the 27th ult., "with a proviso that the acquiescence in emancipation shall be no estoppel to future claims for compensation." On the 31st, the convention repealed the secession ordinance of Jan. 19, 1861, and all subsequent ordinances and resolutions subversive of the national authority. It appears that Orr was elected Governor of South Carolina by about 500 majority over Wade Hampton.

THE Paid Fire Department of this great city is at last organized. The engines will all be "steamers," and, like hose and ladder carriages, will be drawn by horses. The firemen will be in uniform as constantly as the police. The clumsy bell-tower system of alarms will give way to the telegraph, which, as in Philadelphia, will inform, not the public, but each engine in its own house of the exact locality of the fire.

AMONG the numerous criticisms with which THE NATION has been favored, the most recent is also the most original, and perhaps the most difficult to meet. A subscriber reports that his little boy asked him: "Pa, why do you take THE NATION? It does n't make me laugh!" Herein, to be sure, we might have erred in good company if we had followed the example of the Macedonian monarch, as reported in the "Novo Guia da Conversaçaó, em Portuguez e Inglez;" a phrase-book printed in Paris for the use of Portuguese travellers in England:

"Alexander, was see to work Apelles in their workshop, and was resolved to speak painting. But he had play off very bad. Apelles told him laughing: 'Be quite, my lord, you does to laugh the boys which grind the colors.'"

MR. TOWNSEND HARRIS is, we find, mistaken in supposing that he has in his possession a translation of the works of Epictetus, of the year 1700, by Dr. Stanhope. Dr. Stanhope translated the "Manual," as others did, but he did not translate the "Discourses," which are by far the largest and most important part of Epictetus's "Works." Mr. Harris was probably misled by the title, "Morals," which seemed comprehensive enough to take in everything.

MISSISSIPPI finds her republican form of government to consist in two chief magistrates, the one potential or ornamental, the other actual. Secretary Seward has informed Gov. Sharkey that he is expected to exercise the functions of his office until further advised, in spite of the fact that Gov. Humphreys has been elected by the people and pardoned by the President. It looks as if the latter had begun to distrust his "experiment," or, at least, its reception by Congress, and considers it easier to prolong, if need be, an even nominal military rule than to overturn a restored and working civil establishment. Meanwhile the State appears to be given over to disorder, and the safety of every colored man, in uniform or out of it, to be highly precarious.

A BILL is before the Mississippi Legislature for the punishment of vagrancy. The vagrant, on conviction, is by it bound to find bail in a sum under five hundred dollars not to be a vagrant any more. If he or she, however, relapse, his or her bail is to be forfeited, and he or she is to be suspended by the thumbs three times, and two hours at a time, for the first offence, or else, at the discretion of the court, to receive not more than fifty lashes "on his or her bare back, for three days in succession, well laid on;" for the second offence, the punishment is to be "doubled in days of punishment." "No woman in a state of pregnancy, however," the Christian public will be pleased to learn, "is to be suspended by the thumbs." Minors are to be apprenticed or "sold at public auction, when not otherwise disposed of." The bill is nominally applicable to all vagrants, white or black, but the term of "vagrant" is not defined, and as no court will venture to hold a white man to be a vagrant, we may be sure we shall never hear of a white vagabond being tied up or flogged. Upon the humanizing and elevating effect of this legislation, it is unnecessary to comment. In the meantime, there is stout opposition to the reception of negro testimony, and no talk whatever of negro schools.

BOTH Houses of the Mississippi Legislature have forwarded a magniloquent petition to the President praying for Jefferson Davis's release. It declares him to be one of the noblest characters in history, a son of the State whose "purity," and "integrity," "fortitude," "generosity," "have endeared him to every heart." It says that "the accents of his voice are a remembrance on their ears"—whatever that may mean—and that "the glance of his eye is a sweet recollection." The petition is written in the best Southern style, and is fortified by two quotations from Shakespeare. But it is a mere waste of paper and of eloquence. We have very little doubt that Davis will before long be back in Mississippi, and that, to use the language of the petition, "the atmosphere of freedom's breath will soon invigorate his person."

THE Georgia Convention has also petitioned for Davis's release and pardon, as also those of Seddon, McGrath, Stephens, and various others. They speak in the usual high tone of Davis. They say he was simply their agent; that they imposed on him a responsibility not of his own seeking; that if he is guilty, so are they. Now, what about poor Wirtz? He was simply the agent of the Southern people. He is languishing in prison, probably under sentence of death. He has been condemned, too, for executing the "just vengeance" of an "outraged community" upon men whom Mr. Davis denounced as "hyænas," and declared to be unfit for human intercourse, and yet no voice is raised in his behalf.

THE New York Times published last week an able historical sketch of the Democratic party during the war. A more terrible indictment than this résumé of facts it would be difficult to meet with, and it certainly deserves more permanence and a more attentive perusal than it can receive in the columns of a daily paper.

ONE of the delegates to the South Carolina Constitutional Convention informs us that the best mode of clearing the negroes off plantations where they were not wanted, or refused to work, was a frequent topic of conversation amongst the members, although not brought formally before the convention. As there seemed to be no difference of opinion among them, this talk probably foreshadowed legislation. The plan which seemed to find universal favor was the passage of a law authorizing the arrest and condemnation of any negro who refused to leave a plantation after being properly warned, to be sold into forced labor for a term of years, like the Mexican peons. Let nobody say that this would be a revival of slavery, for South Carolinian gentlemen are, "if they know themselves," incapable of subterfuge.

GOVERNOR PERRY has sent a message to the South Carolina Legislature in which his "little game" is fully revealed. After a review of what has been done by the Constitutional Convention, he urges them to get their senators and members of Congress ready as fast as possible, so as to have them in Washington "ready to take their seats on the first Monday in December." He says that under the act of Congress of March, 1863, the clerk will be obliged to enroll all persons with credentials showing them to have been regularly elected. And as for the oath prescribed by the act of July, 1862, he says it is not the policy of the President to have it administered; that it ought not to be the policy of Congress; that it would exclude all South Carolinians; and, finally, that the Southern members, after being put on the roll by the clerk, can take part in the organization of the House, and vote against the administration of the oath. There is clearly no contingency that Mr. Perry has not foreseen. It is a significant circumstance that the World takes exactly the same view that he does of the clerk's duty in the matter of the enrolment.

Governor Perry also relies a good deal on the conservative doctrine that the Southern States have never been out of the Union, and cannot get out, and his deduction from it, that, the rebellion being now over, they cannot be kept from sending members to Congress, is unanswerable. In fact, the attempts to reconcile the President's policy with his theory of the position of the revolted States have all ended in logical muddles.

THE general public is particularly helpless everywhere, it seems to us. In America we continue to be crushed and killed on our railways without a murmur; and in Europe they submit sweetly to be locked up on theirs into cells where, if one's fellow-prisoner happens to be a murderer or maniac, or monster of any sort, there is no earthly relief from him till the train stops at the next station. In England Müller illustrated the advantages of this system in cases of assassination; and in France a young man named Albert-Edmond Langerfeld, of Strasbourg, has recently shown that it is favorable to rape. He is arrested, but the system remains, and will doubtless receive from others the improvement of which it is susceptible.

AN Ohio railroad corporation granted the exclusive right of way along its line to the Western Telegraph Company. A rival company, by proceedings before a probate court, secured the unoccupied side of the track, but was not allowed to build unmolested. The Western company sought to cover all the space by a system of diagonal wires on alternate poles, and finally made application for an injunction against the intruders, in the United States Circuit Court. The decision was, that the railroad corporation exceeded the powers of its franchise, and its grant, being grossly contrary to public policy, is not to be enforced. It is well that a monopoly which would in time have become grievous and intolerable, has received this timely defeat.

PRESIDENT GEFFRARD has again vindicated his own ability as a ruler, and, so far, the capacity of the black race for republican self-government. His life has been threatened and nearly taken we forget how many times, and one insurrection after another has risen to unseat him. The latest and most formidable, at Cape Haytien, has now succumbed to his merciful persistency, though we were more than once assured that it was succeeding and would succeed, and another page of bloody disorder be added to the history of the island. Meanwhile a rising of the Jamaica negroes is reported, with sufficient circumstantial evidence to put it beyond doubt. British and Spanish war vessels are reported to have been sent to the rescue. There are the usual tales of atrocities on the part of the insurgents. Some months ago we referred to the prevailing discontent in this colony, occasioned primarily by the unequal and odious legislation of the planters against the interests of the laboring classes, and latterly by the contempt with which a petition of grievances was received in the mother country. Already we are told that the present outbreak is due to the unhappy experiment of British West India emancipation. It is nothing of the kind, but on the contrary a warning, which we shall do well to heed, lest we repeat the folly of committing a freed population to the tender mercies of their former masters, to harry and grind and render so miserable that re-enslavement or violent resistance seems the only alternative.

LORD PALMERSTON died on the morning of the 18th ult., in the last week of his eighty-first year. He was worn out, and having held his position for some time solely by dint of prestige, his loss possesses no great political importance. His character is discussed elsewhere.

IT appears tolerably certain that Earl Russell will be the successor of Lord Palmerston as the head of the Cabinet. He is steady, well known, experienced, and, above all, blessed with a large and powerful family connection. Gladstone will probably not be able to make his way to the front till Russell has retired or is dead, as he has several formidable difficulties to contend with. His utterances on the suffrage question, a year ago, brought him into discredit with the conservatives; and he is too good a churchman to be entirely in favor with the Liberals, and yet not good enough to be satisfactory to the Church, for there are strong rumors that he looks on the Irish establishment with an evil eye, and that its destruction is part of the somewhat imperial policy which he is said to be tracing out for that island.

THE rumors of cholera on the Continent grow with hideous rapidity. Fame has even carried the epidemic as far north as Dresden, but this report has been denied. It has certainly, however, broken out at Trieste, and all intercourse between Istria and Venetia is subjected to very severe restrictions. Doubtless people will find their best protection in the approach of winter, which has already set in with unusual sharpness. There have been falls of snow in Venetia, and the Euganean Hills were covered with it early in October.

THE Mayor of Nice has made haste to deny the existence of the cholera in that charming watering-place; and people have now the word of authority that they may go thither to enjoy the delicious climate, and buy bouquets from Alphonse Karr's garden, without fear of the cramps. The sojourners have begun to arrive already, Sir Henry Bulwer among them, and the kings of Belgium and Bavaria are expected.

GARIBALDI was pressed for money some weeks ago, and offered for sale, at Genoa, an Arab horse and colt, for two thousand francs. The minister, Merotti, heard of the proposed sale, and wrote to delay it, saying that a better price could be got. In due time a purchaser appeared who gave five thousand francs for the horses, and a few days later came an order to send them to the king's stables at Turin. The Italian government had taken this indirect method of succoring the necessity of the hero who refuses all reward for the services rendered his country—even a seat in Parliament, which has been tendered to him.

BY the report of the syndics of the Prussian Crown, just published in Berlin, Prussia acknowledges that the German Powers had no claim to Schleswig-Holstein before 1864, when it was ceded to them by Denmark. Since this time, however, they have acquired a right to the Duchies, which the Journal des Débats calls by its name of right of conquest. The Débats hardly knows which to admire most, the naïveté of the syndics, who fancy themselves to have categorically established the rights of Prussia to the Duchies, or that of the Prussian Government, which seems to believe itself justified in the document which condemns it.

SOME of the Parisian journals (which are interested in the restrictions placed anywhere on the press) discuss the late suspension of the Fenian Irish People with a good deal of pleasantry, intentional and unintentional. Le Temps, for example, is of the opinion that although the English Goverment has not permitted The Irish People to appear since the 7th of November, "it has not been suppressed nor even suspended; it has only been impeded;" which the Constitutionnel thinks a charming and delicate locution.

IT seems that the amiable Hungarian people are greatly contented with the little liberty of which Francis Joseph has robbed his German subjects to give them. The Augsburg Allgemeine Zeitung describes the elections at Pesth and other places, for the national assemblies, as very enthusiastic, and the people as quite ready to build their hopes on the faith of a prince who breaks his faith to please them. Not that the suspension of the constitution of the Empire of Austria is so great in fact as in theory. The Reichsrath, which has amused itself with meeting at Vienna for the past few years, has had neither Venetians, Hungarians, Croats, nor Dalmatians among its members; and the popular representation accorded even to the Germans there has been of the doubtful quality of the proverbial liberté comme en Autriche. It is not strange that Francis Joseph should lightly disregard his obligations to a constitution of such partial effect; but it is surprising that any of the numerous peoples over whom he rules should believe that he means them to rule themselves a moment longer than he likes. Meantime, the policy of Austria grows less popular in Germany every day, though the dislike will naturally vent itself only in words, which the Germans love to fight with. It is a complaint that there is yet no treaty of commerce between Italy and the Confederation, and that German trade and industry are shut out from the pleasant places which the English, French, and Belgians are rapidly filling up in Italy—a state of things which is attributed in good measure to Francis Joseph's personal enmity to any sort of accommodation with Victor Emanuel.

THE Pope finds it hard, in spite of the Moniteur's declaration of September 27, to believe that the Emperor will at last withdraw his troops from Rome; incredulity in which, we confess, we had shared, not seeing clearly the Emperor's interest in the justice proposed. But the Moniteur's words have had the best effect, in favor of the government, on the Italian elections, and everybody at Rome, except the Pope and cardinals, expects the French troops to retire. We have nearly finished the history of a great wrong, it seems, and the sealed book of a new epoch is before us; who can guess its contents? Does it treat of a completed Italian unity? Is it of peace or war? We must content ourselves, as we best can, that nothing, apparently, could be worse than a continued French occupation of Rome for the interests of freedom and man; and tremble when we reflect that the seeming good comes through him who loves neither.

THE vintage in North Italy is very abundant this year, and wine will be plenty and cheap. During the last five or six years of scarcity of wine, drunkenness, a vice once almost unknown to Italians, had greatly increased, especially in Venetia, where the malady of the wine was severest. In the absence of their healthful stimulant, the people drank a villanous brandy, called Sciampagnin (little champagne), a name which it lost after American coal-oil began to be generally known in Italy. We there heard it jocosely cried in Venice as "petroleum."

THE hermit of Caprera is a neat hand at epistolary composition, and he has just written a letter which we translate as a model of method for our own letter-writing politicians. He addresses a friend at Milan, who asked his support for certain candidates:

"CAPRERA, ———.

"I do not and will not take part in the elections. The Italian people are no longer under age. Let them choose. And woe to them, and sorrow to us, if they choose ill. G. GARIBALDI."

How much a single letter may alter the whole sense of a word is illustrated by certain of our newspapers which have been printing *k*inderpest for *r*inderpest. By this conversion of kine into kin the cattle-plague in England becomes the destroyer of children.

THE Viennese authorities are making preparations for the erection of a monument to the great Prince Eugene of Savoy. Court and people will take part in the ceremonies, which will also have something of the character of a religious fête.

A DAUNTLESS young Englishwoman made, on the 3d of October, the last ascent of Mont Blanc for the season. There had been thirty-five ascents during the summer. The Swiss journal, Mont Blanc, remarking this fact, reminds its readers of the first ascent ever made, which took place in 1786, and since which the arduous feat has been repeated two hundred and ninety-three times. More than half of the whole number of ascents have been made during the last five years.

A DROLL comment on the value of much of the political gossip in the European journals, is the announcement that the thief who stole the jewels of the Queen of Naples is said to have had no political motive in the robbery.

THE FREEDMEN.

GEN. HOWARD passed from Charleston to Edisto Island, on the 19th of last month, in company with Gen. Saxton and a number of the former owners of the island. This was one of those set apart by order of Gen. Sherman for the residence of the colored people, who have settled there to the number of 3,000 and upward. The order of the President, under which Gen. Howard is acting, contemplates the restoration of their estates to the old proprietors, provided both planters and freedmen can be brought to a satisfactory arrangement. The Government appears to claim, not the title, but only the temporary custody of the colonized lands. The late owners agree to retain and employ all the people on the island, if they are willing, and to interpose no obstacle to the establishment of schools. One object of the general's visit was to ascertain the disposition of the freedmen to serve their employers, under the protection of Government, for wages or on shares. Hundreds met him and his party as they landed, and their largest church was crowded to listen to him. The scene was a sad one, for the congregation were evidently disappointed. They objected to working for their old masters, and trusting them for pay. They complained that the lands were to be taken from them after actual possession had been promised and thus far secured to them. They desired either leases or ownership. So decided was the spirit thus manifested, that the owners themselves, on their return, expressed a wish to Gen. Howard to lease their estates to any who would pay them a fair rent, and relieve them of both lands and people. On the 20th the general visited Columbia, by appointment, to meet the provisional governor, the governor elect, and others. Mr. Orr, however, failed to be informed in season to arrive. The whole of the upper part of South Carolina is filled with refugees from Charleston and the seaboard, including many officers and soldiers of the Confederate army, who still retain their rebel uniform, feelings, and manners. They imperil the lives of our officers, insult our soldiers, and unmercifully abuse and wantonly murder the negroes. Officers dare not go beyond their lines, and the negroes have formed "Union Leagues" for self-defence. The most loyal citizens, while conceding that slavery is dead, still talk of "the sovereign State of South Carolina." All are filled with a hatred of whatever appertains to, or is associated with, the North, together with an especial hatred of "niggers." So ripe, indeed, are the elements for a conflict between the two races, that Gen. Howard thought it advisable to issue a circular on the 24th, in which he enjoins the agents of the Bureau to avoid giving offence in the language of their official reports, to bear themselves calmly amid the hostile sentiments of the community, and steadily to preserve a just course toward employers and employees, instructing both in their reciprocal duties. On the afternoon of Sunday, Oct. 22, he addressed an intelligent audience of some 4,000 freedmen in Zion's Church, Charleston. In private conversation, at the close of the ceremonies, the same feelings were betrayed by the city blacks as by those on the plantations. They protested against the course of the Government in regard to the land; they dreaded the restoration of their oppressors to political power. On the 26th, Gen. Howard spoke to the freedmen in Savannah.

Gen. Canby has revoked the order of Gen. Fullerton by which vagrant freedmen were to be arrested in Louisiana.

Lieut. Smith, assistant superintendent for Fairfax County, Va., says that all the refugees and freedmen there are self-supporting, and no camps for either now exist. There is not a school in the county, although there are one hundred and thirty-five freedmen in the vicinity of Fairfax Court House, fifty at the station, and the same number at Lewinsville. The behavior of the people is in every way exemplary, and few cases of oppression have come to his notice. Education is the greatest want.

Captain Spurgeon, assistant superintendent for Washington, reports a large number of applications for servants from Maryland, the Eastern Shore, and the North. The last are the hardest to fill; the freed people are averse to going North.

—A number of the colored men of Norfolk, Va., have combined to purchase a farm of 1,000 acres for $10,000, on Currituck Sound, twenty miles from the city. They expect to subdivide their purchase.

—The National Freedmen's Savings Bank has already more than a quarter of a million of dollars on deposit.

THE REAL ROAD TO LARGE PRODUCTION.

THE plan sketched out by Governor Humphreys, of Mississippi, for the "regulation of labor" in that State, is one of striking simplicity. He says that, first of all, negroes must be compelled to work for their living. Idleness or vagrancy cannot be allowed. Next, that the cultivation of cotton, the great staple of the State, requires constant, steady work from January to January; that contracts between planters and negroes must, therefore, be for this period, and any negro leaving his employer in the interval must be restored to him by force. Plans very similar to this are evidently in contemplation in other cotton States, and if carried out they will, of course, result in the reduction of the negro, not certainly to slavery, but to prædial serfdom, which is the stage above slavery, and in several important respects a marked improvement on it, but still is a condition to which it would be highly improper to allow the freedmen to be reduced by State legislation, without greater precautions against the abuse of the arrangement than, we fear, State legislators would ever prescribe. It would, of course, be a mockery to call that "a contract" which a man is forced to enter into on pain of going to jail, or to suppose that the power of changing masters once a year, on the first of January, would give the negro any real control over his own destiny. Nothing would be easier, as we know, than for the masters to enter into an agreement not to employ the discontented "hands" of their neighbors, and even if they came to no formal understanding on the subject, the cohesive bond of caste would always be strong enough to make it an "ungentlemanly" thing to do, and cause anybody who was guilty of it to be tabooed socially.

Any system of compulsory yearly contracts which is intended, as Governor Humphreys' language clearly indicates, to determine permanently the relation between the negro and his employer, would simply furnish the South with a degraded and ignorant peasantry instead of slaves, and any system which the State legislatures would provide, and which would enjoy complete exemption from Federal inspection and control, would certainly not contemplate the elevation of the negro at any period to the rank and privileges of a free citizen. No legal or official notice has as yet been taken in any Southern State even of the possibility of the negro becoming at any future time competent to make his own contracts, or of the possibility of the ordinary remedies provided by the law for the regulation of white men's affairs sufficing for the regulation of his relations with his employer. Governor Humphreys insists upon it that he shall never attain to social or political equality, or even emerge, or be considered capable of emerging, from a condition of a ward or serf, or whatever it may be proper to call a man who can only keep out of jail by entering into engagements prescribed for him by other people. We do not mean to maintain that a negro ought not to be compelled by law to provide himself with some means of earning an honest livelihood, or that when he enters into a contract he ought not to be compelled to keep it, or that in fixing the duration of contracts regard should not be had to the peculiar nature of Southern industry and the length of time it takes to bring the leading Southern crop to maturity, but we maintain that whether the States are in the Union or not, the regulation of these matters ought not to be left to them alone. The whole country, through the general Government, ought to have its voice in it and its eye upon it, and any provision that is made for the peculiar wants of the freedmen at the present moment ought to take notice of the fact that his condition, just now, is exceptional and transitional.

The fact is, we fear very few people at the South believe in the educating influence of freedom. And yet, not only does it exist, but it is the influence of all others of which the negro just now stands most in need. It cannot well operate, however, on people whose choice as to the nature of their employment, place of residence, mode of life, wages, can only be exercised one day in the year. We want the negro to learn to take care of himself as rapidly as possible, and he can only learn this by having himself to take care of, not on the thirty-first of December only, but on every day in the year; by having the opportunity of bettering his condition, or seeking to better it, constantly open to him; by his possessing full liberty to seek his fortune elsewhere, if he does not feel that he has found it where he is, we will not say every day, but at tolerably frequent intervals. There are some who imagine that men can have their wits sharpened and their morals purified by learning the catechism, or listening to sermons or lectures, no matter what their daily life may be; but the experience of mankind does not justify this belief. The best and most improving lessons which people receive, and especially people who, like the negroes, are emerging from a state of barbarism, are those which they learn from living in the world, or managing or trying to manage their own business; and we are satisfied, and everybody else may be, that the negro will never be fitted for freedom except by having freedom given him—not modified, or curtailed, or watered freedom, but just the same freedom as everybody else. You may preach to him till you are hoarse of the beauties of industry, and enforce your arguments by the tread-mill; but he will only learn to love industry by suffering from idleness, as white men have learnt it. A negro bound by a contract for a whole year to one spot and to one master, with the certainty that he will, if he hesitates to renew it, or find another employer at the expiration of his engagement, have to go to jail as a vagrant, cannot possibly have much occasion for the exercise of prudence, forethought, or self-restraint. Chained from year to year to one spot, he would soon cease to be moved by any of the higher motives for a change, and would never learn to plot or plan, to feel the promptings of ambition, or that "divine discontent" which is not only the root of all that is noble in human character, but the very foundation of individual and national growth.

We shall probably be told, that without legislation of this kind cotton cannot be grown at the South as it has been grown. We think it very likely; and, in fact, all the accounts from the South warrant the belief that there will, for a year or two at least, be a great falling off in the cotton crop, owing to a variety of reasons, perhaps more than all others to the change in the condition of the laborer. But we really must get over the notion that the great mission of the American people, or of any part of it, is the production of goods for the market. We are far from underrating the influence of industry on progress in the highest sense of the word, but no industry can ever attain to assured and permanent prosperity that is not based on human freedom and intelligence. The chief concern and chief aim of this nation is, and always must be, if it is to achieve lasting greatness, not to export or import largely, but to make human beings wiser, happier, freer, and more self-respecting than they ever have been elsewhere; and the nation which keeps this always in view as its first great object is very sure, in the long run, also to be the richest. In individual cases we do not always see prosperity follow good conduct; but it may be safely said that Providence has so arranged it that the rigid observance of the great laws of morality, rigid respect for justice and individual rights on the part of communities, is always the surest road to material wealth. We have only to look into history to find that the countries which have been most successful in heaping up riches have been so almost in the ratio of their love of freedom and equality.

The experiment of "letting the negro alone," at the South, may seem a losing one this year and next year. It will, undoubtedly, raise the price of calico for the present, but it will most assuredly pay in the end more than any other device that can be thought of. No great social revolution ever took place without causing great temporary loss and inconvenience. Real prosperity will never come there until the laborer has become intelligent enough to take care of his own interests, and is aided by the law in doing so; and if measures be now taken to keep him in the condition of a serf, for the sake of making "big crops" in 1866–7, it will show that the planters are as wanting in business foresight as they have already shown themselves to be in political insight. Jails, and contracts, and coercive legislation will never make men good producers; nor will moral lectures. There is but one way by which the condition of a peasantry has ever been improved, and that is by awakening in them new desires and the love of material comforts. Nothing makes a man begin to work really hard or earnestly except the wish for better clothes or food, or house or furniture, and this wish can only be awakened by freedom, by change, by constant contact with new people, and visits to new places. The negro in America has been managed now for over a century on the theory that he was a peculiar and incomprehensible being, and he has proved a deplorable failure. Suppose the experiment be now tried of treating him as a badly used, well-robbed, well-kicked white man; as a commercial speculation, we warrant it will pay. To be sure two, or three, or four years may elapse before satisfactory returns begin to come in, but may not this be said of some of the most promising ventures of the day—railroads, mines, and canals?

LORD PALMERSTON.

THE death of a man who for thirty years has played so prominent a part as Lord Palmerston, not only in the politics of his own country, but in those of Europe—whose vitality was so strong that he wore his harness to the last hour of a life of unusual length, naturally makes a profound impression upon the whole civilized world. But there has probably been no man who has ever made the same figure on the political stage in his own country, and exercised so potent an influence on the affairs of others, whose disappearance from the scene is less calculated to cause confusion or embarrassment, or to fill even those who most loved and admired him with the sense of bereavement. He was not eloquent; he was not a thinker; he represented no order of ideas either in church or state; he neither loved nor hated with passion; his personal character was not such as to elicit the moral sympathy or confidence of the best portion of his countrymen. He was the author of no policy, and never gave the slightest evidence of being troubled with a single theory which he desired to see embodied in legislation or adopted by society. He probably never uttered in public a sentence by which one heart in England was fired or one eye moistened. His bon-mots, many of which betrayed his lurking contempt for the popular morality, will probably be remembered long after all his speeches are forgotten. To call him a statesman in the sense in which Peel, or Gladstone, or Cobden are called statesmen, would be an abuse of language. The statute books and parliamentary journals, during his half century of office, may be searched in vain for a trace of his influence on the social or political progress of Great Britain. How much the indirect support which he lent to revolutionary movements on the Continent may have done for the cause of good government it is impossible to determine. All we know for certain is, that at his death English influence abroad was at its lowest ebb, and that there was diffused through the ranks of foreign liberals a distrust of English professions which it would need but very little more disappointment to fan into hatred of the English name. The movement which, of all others, has given the European peoples the fairest promise of approaching redemption—the Italian rising of 1859—met with his heartiest opposition. And the event which, of all that have happened since the French Revolution, has done most to spread doubt and despondency amongst those who rest their hopes of the future happiness and progress of mankind on the possibility of uniting liberty with democracy—the coup d'état of 1851—met with his heartiest support.

If all this be true, the position which he retained for so many years in the ranks of English liberals will, to most people, seem hard to understand, and to Americans doubly hard, owing to the total absence amongst us of the class of which Palmerston was the type, and to our want of familiarity with the way of looking at life and its objects in which he was bred and in which he lived. He was essentially a "gentleman" of the eighteenth century, but gifted with a tact and quickness of perception such as few gentlemen of the eighteenth century could ever boast. He was an aristocrat from the top of his head to the sole of his feet; was permeated with that conventional morality by which aristocratic societies are governed, and which elevates the exhibition of strong feeling, or the subjection of one's conduct to its influence, almost to the rank of crime. And the yoke of this code was made all the easier to him—was made, in fact, the only one he could live under—by a temperament such as few men ever possessed, and the buoyancy of which was preserved to the last hour of his life by a rare combination of what are called "worldly advantages." He was handsome graceful, and accomplished; well born, "well off," and blessed with a constitution so vigorous that the vigils of fifty years of parliamentary toil—under which so many English politicians succumb, and from which Lord Russell had to seek refuge in the House of Lords ten years ago, found him at eighty one of the most sleepless and wary debaters that ever rose from the Treasury bench to reply at two o'clock in the morning. He was thus exempted from most of the cares by which a political career in England is always beset and is often marred. He never had to fight his way under that "cold shade of aristocracy" which blighted Canning, which often made Peel's steps tottering and uncertain, and which has had much to do with leaving Disraeli high and dry in his old age on the beach of opposition—an influence which, though much weakened now, was, in Palmerston's younger days, all powerful. His success in the House of Commons was, first of all, due to his social success, the political value of which in England can be but imperfectly appreciated here, where political and social life are so completely dissevered, and next to his debating skill and his party fidelity.

He was not, as we have said, a great orator; he never made a really "great speech." But he was what is, for parliamentary purposes, better than a great orator—a "telling" debater. The distrust of rhetoric in the House of Commons has been growing steadily for many years. Two-thirds of the flowery orations which are delivered in Congress, and afterwards distributed in pamphlets, would, if attempted in Westminster Hall, fall on empty benches. The House of Commons will not bear instruction; since the growth of the newspaper press, it will hardly bear persuasion. Passionate appeals to its feelings only excite smiles. It wants of all things to be entertained, and nothing entertains it so much as exhibitions of intellectual fence between ministers and the opposition, in which the speaker shows his skill in hitting hard without resorting to personalities—and in which parliamentary and social experience, historical knowledge, familiarity with the feelings and prejudices of the peculiar body of men who compose the House of Commons, a ready use of the current social philosophy, and a strong sense of humor, and skill in the display of it, are better weapons than any amount of declamatory power. There are, of course, exceptions to this rule. Cobden showed what may be done by prodigious mastery of facts and power of logical statement; and Gladstone shows on great occasions, as in the yearly production of his budget, the prodigious fascination which scholarship, eloquence, lore, and sincerity of character can throw round the driest of all subjects. But Palmerston, who had none of these things, was, nevertheless, the typical debater; and his influence was greatly increased by his rigid party fidelity, by the loyalty with which he stuck to every colleague or supporter, through no matter what blundering or gaucherie, to his unfailing good temper, and that reluctance to press even opponents too hard, that religious respect for the convenances which was one of the results of his aristocratic training, and through which he rarely allowed the aristocratic feeling, by which he was really saturated, to break. One of the few occasions on which he let his high-born insolence get the better of him, was in that attack on Mr. Cobden, a few years ago, in which he bid him stick to commercial affairs and not meddle with war and peace—"ne sutor ultra crepidam."

The hold which Lord Palmerston retained on the affection of the English people is less difficult to explain than his popularity with the educated classes. Many of the latter hated him; others distrusted, and others barely tolerated him. His philosophy of life and of politics was abhorrent to the thinkers and reformers of the country, but in the hearts of the crowd he bore more unquestioned sway than he ever did at London dinner tables. He was a lord, and there is no Englishman, from the scavenger up, who does not dearly love a lord. But he was more than this; he was one of the manliest of men, the very embodiment of the qualities which the nation, not, we admit, in its highest, but in its prevailing mood, most strongly admires. He was plucky, audacious, self-satisfied. He never quailed before an enemy at home or abroad. He never shrunk from the consequences of anything he ever said or did. He was cheery, tolerant, kind-hearted—a lover of sport, shot well, rode well to hounds, and remained down to the last year of his life an indefatigable horseman. He liked all "manly sports;" would have enjoyed seeing a good "set to" in the ring; was as happy as a king in the grand stand at Epsom or Ascot, and had wonderful powers of "chaff." His encounters on election days with Rowley, the butcher at Tiverton, were read of with pride and delight by millions who never saw him, but adored him as above all things every inch an "Englishman."

And although, as we have said, at heart an aristocrat, he had learnt well the lesson in which the English aristocracy has shown such thorough proficiency, that for a "gentleman" to secure influence and authority in a free country in our day, he must rest them on other things than rank, or birth, and if he will rule the people, must lead them through their own ideas. We must do him the justice, too, to say that he was a hearty lover of fair play. Through long years his voice was invariably raised in support of law, and justice, and equal rights, and popular governments, within those limits, narrow as we consider them, which English political philosophy has placed to political progress. During the last four or five years most of his political influence had died out. He was able to retain his position at the head of his party mainly owing to the popular admiration of his pluck, and endurance, and vitality. And in truth it was difficult even for those who were not his countrymen to avoid feeling a profound human sympathy with the wonderful struggle which he was so long able to maintain with old age. A more brilliant example of the resistance which a happy temperament, fortified by a rigid resolution not to be troubled by the ordinary ills of life, may enable an ordinarily healthy man to offer to the approach of natural decay, was probably never witnessed. And he must be strangely constituted who can see without honest human pride the gallantry with which the old man continued to do the work which he loved, and which, whether well or ill done, was set him to do, as long as his well-worn frame held together.

A DYNASTIC REVIVAL.

On the 16th of September, Maximilian, Emperor of the Mexicans and so forth, adopted as his heir a grandson of that gentleman who is sometimes spoken of as Augustin the First, but who is better known as Iturbide, as Napoleon's marshals are well known by their names to thousands of persons who would be severely puzzled were they required to mention the titles that they received from the first Bonapartean emperor. Iturbide was the first and only emperor of genuine native growth that America has known, the Braganzas of Brazil being Europeans, while the black emperors who have figured imperially in Hayti had too much of the African in them to be allowed to count for anything in the estimation of democratic republicans of the American stamp. He was a native of Mexico, but his father came from Old Spain, being a Navarrese, we believe, or a Biscayan. Iturbide was distinguished as an upholder of the royal authority in Mexico for about a dozen years after the Mexican revolution began, and had he remained faithful to Ferdinand VII., it is difficult to comprehend how the line of Castilian viceroys could have been cut off. Mexico might have been as much a Spanish possession at this hour as Cuba or the Philippines, had he not, apparently without provocation, thrown off his allegiance, and established Mexican independence. His conduct has always appeared to us inexplicable, as it was contrary to what might have been expected from his long military career, and, indeed, was almost as strange as would have been that of Sir William Howe had that British general, after the battle of Brandywine and the seizure of Philadelphia, declared for the American cause, and proceeded to put an end to whatever of authority George III. still had in the Thirteen Colonies. One can understand the conduct of Guadalupe Victoria, who was a consistent liberal from first to last, but Iturbide had been one of the most successful of the enemies of independence. Personal ambition, as in so many other instances, probably was at the bottom of his conduct, though that ambition may have been combined with the intention to do well by his country. "The plan of Iguala" was, we presume, the first of that long series of pronunciamientos which we associate with Mexican history for almost fifty years. Iturbide became emperor in 1822, as Augustin I., but his reign did not last a year. He abdicated, and the Mexicans treated him liberally; but when he returned to Mexico, in 1824, he was easily disposed of, being taken and shot. He threw for a crown, and got a coffin, the better prize of the two. His family lived in the United States for many years, highly respected, his wife dying but recently.

The Austrian Emperor of the Mexicans, according to a current statement, raised the family of his predecessor to princely rank, but it is said that one of the sons of Augustin I. refused the honors proffered him. A grandson, if the late report be true, has been selected by Maximilian as his heir, and will, should he live, and should Maximilian himself succeed, become emperor of the descendants of the men who refused to be ruled by his grandfather. It would be one of the most wonderful of the curiosities of history if this young Iturbide should one day wear the imperial crown of Mexico, obtained for him by a Bonaparte, for without the action of Napoleon I. Maximilian would have had no more chance of becoming emperor of the Mexicans than he had of becoming Grand Lama. But something may occur to deprive the young Mexican of his chances of reigning, even if he should live, and if his adoptive father should become a monarch in fact as well as in name. Maximilian is yet a young man—about thirty-four—and he has a young wife who belongs to a fruitful family, she being a granddaughter of Louis Philippe. What if a son should be born unto the imperial pair? Would not such an occurrence operate to the setting aside of the adopted son? A daughter would be preferable, as she might become young Iturbide's wife, and so a happy family alliance be formed. As the Emperor can hardly be supposed to despair of offspring, we may suppose, without being considered too censorious, that his adoption of a Mexican as his heir is of the nature of a "dodge," and that, as we should say in the United States, he is making "political capital." He would reconcile Mexicans to his rule, by holding out to them the prospect that the crown which he has forced them to place on his head will one day be worn by one of their own race; but he reserves to himself the right to make such disposition of it as events and time shall decide to be most likely to promote his policy.

THE STREET COMMISSIONERS TO THE CHOLERA.

INVOCATION.

I.

Cholera, Spirit of Orient, hail!
Over the wide deep cometh a wail;
For the fell Shape, that stood cloudy and vague,
Guarding hell's gate, has arisen to plague,
In thy port, grimmer than famine's or war's,
Nations that send forth their cry to our shores.

II.

Born of the curse of the East, to the West
Onward thou journeyest ever, O Pest!
And where thou passest, the billowing graves
Rise multitudinous, as the sea-waves
Billow and roll in the ship's wake, and far Troubled like waters the peoples' hearts are.
Cairo, and Constantinople, and she Sitting in sorrow by Adria's sea;
Leghorn, Marseilles, and the darlings of Spain,
Heap thy course thick with their myriad slain;
And the North, winter-kept, early shall be
Pale as her snows, in the spring-time, with thee:
Then thou wilt rise with the breath of the South,
Honeyèd poison and bane in thy mouth,
And from the North's desolation wilt turn
Hither thy face, where the summer shall burn
On such a harvest as the earth bore,
Ripe for a pestilence, never before.

III.

Cholera, cholera, cholera, come!
Come to the city we deck for thy home!
Come to Manhattan! New York never gave
Prince, hero, charlatan, exile, or knave,
Cholera, such a Reception as we,
Queen of men's terror! have plotted for thee!

IV.

Come in the lustiest joyance of June,
When the earth's heart is in perfectest tune
With her Creator's will, and all the days,
Touched with His benison, utter His praise;
When from her woodland dells Nature's wild health
Breathes over fields that are crowned with her wealth;
Then, when contentment unutterable
In every motion of being shall dwell:
Then with thy tremors, and cholics, and cramps,
Then with thy pallors and death-boding damps,
Come to the city we deck for thy home—
Cholera, cholera, cholera, come!

V.

Come to a city of orient filth,
Orient spirit! and bathe in the spilth
Nameless and loathly of gutters that run,
Stink in the shadow and steam in the sun!
Nest in the dung-heaps that border these rills,
Ancient, eternal, and fixed as the hills!
In putrid sewerage quarter the still Host of invisible slaves of thy will:
Hold in the tenement houses thy court;
Make of the poor thy sovereign sport;
Hunt them by basement, by garret, by stair,
Where'er they cower and lurk, hunt them there!
In the light sickening, in the dark dying,
Hunt them, and smite them, and set their souls flying,
Till from their poisonous anguish the air
Wide through the city thy power shall bear,
And on soft couches the sick shall be strown
Thick as they languish on straw and on stone;
And the doors misery knocked at in vain
Open shall fly at the touch of her slain;
And at all hearthstones and boards thou shalt loom,
Presence of terror, and sorrow, and doom!

VI.

Come, thou, whose terrible coming shall make
Love hard as fear, and the bridegroom forsake
Her that is stricken with death in his arms;
Come, with thy rumors and endless alarms:
Make men abhor one another; make sons
Fly mothers flying their fatherless ones;
Make kindred cruel to kindred, and blood
Venom to blood; let night's silence brood
On the noon's heart, now beating so high;
Let all the voices of traffic be dumb;
Pleasure's gay speech, and youth's laughter free,
Children's sweet treble, and babe's babble, be Hushed at the banquet devoted to thee;
Nought but the mourners' slow feet going by,
With the dull wheels of the hearses that creep,
Harnessed to nightmares, trouble the sleep
Of the great city we deck for thy home!
Cholera, cholera, cholera, come!

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

LUMBERTON, N. C., Oct. 23, 1865.

LUMBERTON stands on the left bank of the Lumber River, at a distance of thirty-three miles from Fayetteville. The village is small, with only four or five hundred inhabitants and without pretensions to beauty, for it lies scattered over a sandy level and on all sides is closely encircled by the pine barren, which here and there pushes itself into the streets and among the straggling houses. It is the capital of Robeson County, and carries on a small trade with Wilmington in the products of the forest, the two towns being connected by a railway on which trains run up and down every other day. The country to the north I found in most respects like that between Fayetteville and Raleigh; the clearings, however, are considerably more numerous, and the road oftener leads across small morasses where sand and pines are replaced by a dense growth of gums and creeping vines, and cypresses, each tree, amid the surrounding water or black mud, standing on a little hummock of earth which its roots hold together. By the roadside in such places a string of hewn logs, raised on props two or three feet high, gives a narrow foot-way to pedestrians, while the horseman finds the swamp water, sometimes for several rods of the road, washing against his stirrups.

The houses of this district are commonly low black buildings of one story, with roofs projecting so as to form a gallery or piazza, and apparently contain two or three rooms. Plaster is often dispensed with in the interior finishing, and sometimes the walls are faced with pine, smooth and unpainted, which becomes quite handsome as it darkens with age. At various distances from the dwelling are half a dozen small out-buildings, which can be distinguished from the negro huts by the absence of mud chimneys and the looser structure of their walls. Corn is the principal crop, but the wealthier farmers raise some cotton, and a good deal of rosin and turpentine is made. Although the soil and the people seem so poor, more than half the inhabitants of Robeson were formerly held as slaves.

I stopped at one of the poorest houses on the road to-day and tried to buy a dozen ears of corn, but could only get a sheaf of fodder. Four rickety cabins in the middle of a corn-field, which the wind was whirling into clouds of dust, formed the homestead, and the family consisted of an old woman and five or six white-headed children of all sizes. She civilly set a chair for me beside the hearth, and as I sat down all the household gathered round, a stranger, I suppose, being an unusual sight. One little boy stretched himself out on the floor, with his feet in the ashes, and made many remarks on my dress and equipments: "Mister, be you a Yankee? you wear a Yankee coat." "Them 's a bully spurs; gi' me one, mister?"

"Hit a' n't," said his mother; "a Yankee wears a blouse coat. Git up an' go 'long. Ye laugh so large! why can 't ye behave smart?"

"I suppose he do n't see a man from the North very often."

"Ye be from thar, then. I reckoned ye was. No, he's seed Yankees, but he behaves just so ugly. Sherman's companies come along here, an' they was dreadful. I allus liked your nation afore, but I can 't niver git it over to them soldiers."

"What did they do—rob?"

"No, sir, that war n't hit; 'peard like they thout I warn't worth comin' to see; but they tuck off my man. 'T was a Sunday mornin' when we heerd the Yankees was comin', and I was scart bad, for my son thar was up to P'int Lookout; they tuck him for a prisoner at Fisher, and the old man had gone off to the dam. The children come running to tell 'Here 's the Yankees, here 's the Yankees,' and I began to wish the old man was to home, or I warn't. But the first company of 'em went right along that same road, and they looked, but they did n't come into the lot. My man hed been in the army, but he come home; I think 't was two days before the Yankees come; nor he did n't git leave nuther. Well, mister, he allus was sickly, an' he niver thout the war was right; an', I tell you, he got right sick of it, an' so did a meny, and he jist tuck home, an' I do n't blame him; I dunno as I do—not a bit. When he heerd the Yankees was comin', he knowed I 'd be scart, and thout he 'd come back to the house. He was crossin' the lot, an' hed his uniform on, an' they seed it. I do n't reckon they 'd ha' come except for that, but a parcel of 'em rode their critters right up to the door, an' filled the house full in a minute. They begun to talk to the old man, an' he talked too. They said he was a Johnny Reb; he said he war n't, and told how he was a deserter; but they swore they would n't believe a word he 'd say. One of 'em told him to pull off his shoes, an' he hed to. Some of 'em was smart men, you know, mister, an' some was low down. They said he must go with them, and then I began to be scart bad, for I did n't know whether they wanted him for a good thing or what, and I begged 'em hard. But they told me 't was no use, they was agwine to take every rebel soldier along an' keep 'em prisoner, for they was the very ones shot your men. That was March, an' I niver seed him agin till July, an' then he was a mighty sick man; you could n't hiv him to take that journey agin, he said, for he was amost starved to death; his feet was so sore he could n't walk for a week, an' he did n't live long, nohow."

"Well, mister," said the son, "is the fightin' all done now, do ye reckon, or how is it?" I assured him that the war was entirely over. His next question was in relation to the negroes: "D' ye think the niggers is r'aly free?" I thought there could be no doubt of it.

"Well, what 's gwine to be done with 'em? Some say they 's to be sent off into another country, into some island somewhar; but no island would n't take 'em, would it?"

"Oh no, they 'll be kept here where they are."

"Well, then," said the woman, "the Government is agwine to give 'em land, I reckon; we heerd that too."

"No, what land they get they must buy, I believe, as other people do."

"Well, how 'll they live then? The rich people won't sell 'em land, nor yit they won't hire 'em."

"No, they hate 'em because they 's free," said the son; "an' a many of em 's got to die this winter, for they turn 'em off all they can. But, I say, mister, if a nigger 's free, is he to hev his vote like any man?"

"Is he gwine to hev his oath?" asked the woman.

"I think it 's pretty likely that he will be allowed to testify; I do n't know about the voting."

"Well, do n't it seem kind o' hard to hev a nigger come an' make oath agin ye—a right coal-black nigger? How is that? Is it right or a' n't it?"

I showed how easily it would be possible to inflict great injustice upon the negroes if they were declared incapable of testifying.

"Well, sartin it does look like it, an' I reckon they will hev to hev it."

"They do hev it now," her son said, "whenever the Superintenders of Freedom arrests yer. Thar was McM——, ye know. He 's a man lives about six miles from here. He licked an old nigger woman o' his so 't she could n't lift up her hand, an' they let her give in her evidence. I heerd it made McM—— mad; he 's a proud feller. But the colonel, or the superintender, told him if he was gwine to talk, talk, an' mind himself, or he 'd git into trouble. He hed to pay seventy-five cents a day to her till she got well, an' the doctor's bill, an' two or three more bills."

After a little talk about the national currency, which they said some of their neighbors refused to receive, and which they had been told would soon be good for nothing, I bade them good-bye, and rode on to this place, which I reached just before sunset. The landlord, smoking with a friend in the tavern parlor, seems to be angry beyond measure because the State Convention has repudiated the rebel war-debt.

"It 's Bill Holden did it," he says, with many expletives, "and it 's just like him; it 's exactly Bill Holden. I 'll tell you the whole story. I had it from our representative. When he went up to Raleigh to attend the convention, he went down to the Yarborough Hotel, and there he found Judge Reed, and Judge Gilliam, and eighteen or twenty more prominent gentlemen, who asked him to go up with them into a private room, for they had a document from Washington they wanted to show him. He went up, and they read him a letter written by our State agent in Washington, Doctor—what is his name? You know who I mean. He said that he had been admitted to interviews with every member of the cabinet, and it was the opinion of every one of them, and it was supposed by them to be the opinion of Andy Johnson, that the question of the war-debt had better be left alone; it would only make trouble and divide the people to discuss it now. So the convention did let it alone, and when any ordinances or resolutions touching on it were brought forward, they were staved off in some way or other, and the whole thing was left to the Legislature; that was the general understanding. And now Bill Holden's part comes in. On Wednesday morning Jonathan North was first announced as a candidate for governor. As soon as Holden knew it he telegraphed to Washington—what he telegraphed you know as well as I do—and down comes this telegram of Johnson's, commanding the convention to repudiate, and it obeyed. Now, I do n't care if it keeps the State out of the Union for forty years, I 'll never vote for Bill Holden to be the governor of it; no sir, never while my head is hot."

MARION COURT HOUSE, S. C., Oct. 25.

Just at dusk yesterday, after wading through Ashpole swamp, a dreary morass several miles long and a quarter of a mile broad, I crossed the State line and entered South Carolina. The last North Carolinian with whom I talked was an old lady living not far from the swamp, who owns a large farm and cultivates a few acres of it.

"But it 's more," she said, "than I 'll crap next year; I 'll do well, I expect, if I can make a livin' off it, for the niggers a' n't gwine to do any more steady work. Eight and ten dollars a month they want, and twenty days idle time. One o' my gals, Jane, told me they was to have land given to 'em for themselves. 'Do n't think you 'll git mine,' I told her, 'for I 'll cut your throat first.' Confound her impudence! But every one of 'em goes off by the first o' January, and what corn and taters we need my son 'll have to make, and if he can't I can. The niggers is jest gone to ruin, and I wish old Sherman had taken 'em every one when he freed 'em. I never did have no use for a free nigger anyhow. Some o' my neighbors thinks these poor white men round here is gwine to hire out and make cotton, but I know better. The white men here that di n't own land never was raised to work, and they won't work. Not gwine to do it. I can tell the Yankee nation it 's jest cut off its own nose to spite its face, for it 's not gwine to git cotton any more, nor corn to eat, and their manufactures is ruined. They 've ruined the niggers too, and there never was a happier people than they was. Why do n't the Yankees move 'em off? If they do n't, they 'll be killed up jest as sure 's your born. One was killed last Monday was a week, and lots and cords of 'em 's goin' the same road."

I asked for the particulars.

"Stealin'. It happened about seven miles from here. Mr. —— had been havin' a corn-shuckin', and he give the niggers a supper afterwards; that 's the rule in these parts. Well, he thought it mout be some of the corn would go that night, so after supper he took his gun, and went down to the corn-house. Sure enough, in a little while a man came down with a basket and filled it up full. Mr. —— let him walk off about twenty steps, and then he fired and the man fell. Come to find out, it was one of his own niggers, that he 'd raised. He lived the night out and died the next mornin' at ten o'clock."

"What was done about it?"

"Well, I do n't jest know. I heerd that Mr. —— went and delivered himself up to the lieutenant o' the home guard; he said he had n't nothin' to do with it, but to go over with him to the captain, and I believe the captain car'd him up to Lumberton."

These same facts were recounted to me again by the farmer with whom I lodged last night, and, in addition, he told me that the defendant was tried on Saturday last by the agent of the Freedmen's Bureau, and having proved, by negroes living on the farm, that the deceased was shot while in the act of stealing, was thereupon discharged from custody and exonerated from blame. The farmer approved of this decision, for it seemed to indicate what he had been hoping for, that the agents and superintendents had recently had orders to be much stricter in their government of the negroes. They needed sharp watching, and one or two such examples as this case furnished would have a good effect. All the stealing, however, was not done by negroes, he said. He had been down to the village that day to tell a man that he could n't undertake to buy cotton for him, nor engage any, until the country became a little quieter. Sometimes the bales are quietly taken away in the night; sometimes a party disguise themselves and seize the cotton by violence; sometimes they go with a pretended order from the district-commander. Last week three bales had been taken out of that neighborhood by men dressed in the Federal uniform, who demanded the cotton as property formerly belonging to the Confederate government. But the owner knew some of the gang, and next day, with a few of his friends, tracked the thieves and took their plunder away. He had never known such times.

"Well, how do you punish the robbers?"

"We have n't had any law all this time, and we could n't do much. I expect it 'll be better now that we 've got back into the Union, and the soldiers are going to be removed."

This last remark somewhat surprised me, but I found on further conversation that he really held the opinion that South Carolina had been fully restored to her place in the Union and to all her powers by the action of the State convention. It was a new idea to him, he said, that Congress had any authority to keep a State out. The war was done, and the convention had freed the niggers; what more could be wanted? The State must be back, for he had seen the representatives going up to Columbia that day.

The dearth of newspapers in Marion District was equally shown by another of his opinions. It was very likely, he thought, that the Congress would pay former slaveholders for the loss of their property. Perhaps a man had been laboring all his life for his money, and had it invested in niggers at the time of the emancipation; it seemed too hard that he should lose it, and he heard a good deal of talk about Government paying a part of the value anyhow. That would be no more than fair.

I thought it would be generally considered unfair.

"Why, I do n't mean for the North to pay it all," he explained; "I mean for the United States to pay it in bonds, and then the whole country, South as well as North, could be taxed to meet the interest on 'em. That would n't be any harder on the North than on the South, would it?"

He seemed quite nettled because I failed to see the justice of the scheme even in this aspect of it, so much so that I thought he might perhaps be the original author of it; but he said it was a good deal talked about among the neighbors, and that he 'd heard it first at the court-house. He did n't care much for himself; had n't but three or four niggers.

Upon the questions of negro suffrage, negro testimony, and colonization of negroes, he had brought himself to the same conclusions which I have so often heard expressed in this region, and so often presented at length: A nigger's oath was n't worth a chew of tobacco; any one of 'em would cut a white man's throat for that any time; as to nigger voting, it was n't worth while talking about it—it meant nigger equality, and white men could n't and would n't stand that; niggers would have to be moved off, they were so lazy that they would n't work more than two days at a time, and so worthless that the other five days of the week would be spent in stealing; they could n't live among white folks.

This man owned a farm of more than two hundred acres, he lived in a very neat log-house, with a trim yard around it, his out-houses and fences were regularly disposed and in good order, nine or ten books were on the mantelpiece, and his surroundings generally, as well as his manners and conversation, showed him to be a good deal above that class commonly called "low-down, triflin' people," or poor white trash.

A ride of twenty miles from his house brought me to this place, a very quiet, pretty little village, full of trees and gardens, and light, elegant houses, among which a huge bare court-house, made of bricks and stucco and iron, seems strangely out of place. In Marion I find, for the first time, the magnolia growing, and not many miles from the village I first noticed branches of the mistletoe, and saw the Spanish moss hanging from the pine and the water-oak.

ENGLAND—THE MINISTERIAL CRISIS.

LONDON, October 21, 1865.

PALMERSTON is dead. You must be an Englishman born and bred to understand thoroughly the impression conveyed by those three words so curtly written. I cannot hope altogether to make intelligible to you the mixture of surprise, regret, and pain which was felt throughout England when, on Wednesday last, the telegraphic wires carried far and wide the news that the Premier's life was ended. Till the morning of that day, the public hardly knew that he was ailing. In my letters I have frequently told you that his state of health gave great alarm to his friends, and that grave doubts were expressed in political circles whether he could ever meet another Parliament. But though I wrote this, and though my reason told me the chances were against his surviving the summer, yet I own candidly I could not realize the truth to myself. You must remember that, ever since I knew what politics meant, Lord Palmerston has been one of the foremost figures amongst English statesmen. I can never recollect the time when he was not spoken of as an old man, whose tenure of office could not be prolonged. Yet I have seen one public man after another fall from out the ranks, and still the Premier was left erect and standing; so that, at last, I, in common with the country, got to have an unreasoning scepticism in the possibility of his death. We had all been told so often that he was breaking, that he could not survive another session, and that he was about to relinquish office; and, session after session, we have seen him so hale and vigorous and full of life that we got to look upon him as a sort of Wandering Jew of politics. The grandsons of the men with whom he had served in office had made their mark upon the world and passed from it; and still he survived. And now that the end has come, we can scarcely comprehend that it has come in very truth.

Towards the close of last spring Lord Palmerston had an unusually severe attack of gout. The attack passed away, but he was never the same man again. For the first time in his life he became irregular in his attendance at the House. The duty of answering questions addressed to the Premier devolved upon Sir George Grey; and on the evenings that Lord Palmerston made his appearance he left early, and took little part in the debates. I saw him often in the House during the last months of the session. He looked fallen to pieces, if such an expression can be fairly used. He would sit for hours dozing on the Treasury bench, with his hands supported on his stick, stuck between his crossed legs, and every now and then shifting his position irritably, as though he was trying to find some attitude so that he could rest easily, and trying in vain. But still, on the rare occasions when he was called upon to speak, he spoke as vigorously, as lucidly, and as curtly as he ever did throughout his career. He had no pretence at any time to oratorical ability; but his faculty of speech, such as it was, remained unaffected to the end. Whenever he entered or left the House, he made an extreme and almost painful effort to walk without leaning on the sticks he used as crutches; but the moment he thought himself out of sight, he betook himself to their aid, and hobbled on feebly and wearily. His friends, and he himself, believed that with the rest of the recess he should recover his strength; but the expectation was not realized. The exertions of mental labor began to tell upon him. Since the elections were over, he has never, I think, appeared at any public meeting, and the occasions on which he came up to London to transact business grew rarer and rarer. Still, not longer than a month ago, a friend of mine, who was constantly in the habit of seeing him, called upon him about business, at Cambridge House, and assured me that he had seldom seen him brisker and brighter than he then appeared. This, I believe, was about his last appearance in an official character. Throughout our hot summer and hotter autumn he kept in comparative health. The first cold of winter killed him. On Sunday last he got chilled when out driving; inflammation of the bladder ensued, and there was no vigor left to resist the attack. On Tuesday his constitution began to give way, and by the forenoon of Wednesday he expired, almost without suffering. Nothing of any note is recorded of his last hours. His mind wandered latterly, rather from weakness than from pain, and he talked a good deal to himself about the treaty securing the independence of Belgium—one of the chief diplomatic acts of his life—and about his approaching birthday—that, if he had lived till yesterday, he would have entered on his eighty-second year.

The first intelligence of his illness was published in the papers of Wednesday morning. Before noon it was known in London that he was dying, and by the afternoon we heard that he was dead. The sensation created by the news was very great; business was pretty well suspended; and throughout the country towns, where public feeling always manifests itself more keenly than in this overgrown, unwieldy metropolis, the signs of mourning were general. Neither at the death of Peel nor Wellington nor Cobden can I recall anything like the general popular regret expressed at the death of Palmerston. The circumstances of Prince Albert's death in the very prime of life created a far more vivid excitement; but for the late Prince Consort there was nothing of the genuine sorrow which all men of all parties gave token of when they learnt that Palmerston was dead.

As I said before, the meaning of this grief is not easy to explain. Even in popular estimation Palmerston was not a very great minister. He was identified with no particular party or cause or measure; he was not a statesman to win the idolatry of the multitude or to command the respect of educated and thoughtful men. My own belief is, that somehow or other he was, if anything, underestimated by his contemporaries. I remember, three years ago, Hawthorne saying to me, as we walked over the field of Manassas, that, little as he appreciated then the merits of Mr. Lincoln, he believed he must be the right man for his post; because, in some way not to be accounted for, the popular instinct was always right in the selection of its rulers. Now, if this doctrine be true, as I hold myself, Lord Palmerston had the infallible testimony of merit conferred by being the choice of the people. If we had had a republic, he would have been returned president time after time by a majority, not only of the counties, but by a majority in every county. The nation loved him; and there must have been in him something to justify that national affection. It was not his fame as a foreign minister, for diplomatic triumphs the English public cares for next to nothing. It was not his reputation as a home minister, for he never promoted any single act of reform till its success was well-nigh assured; and he opposed many of the measures for which the country is now most grateful. A good deal of his popularity, no doubt, was due to his age and the gallantry with which he bore it. Young men were proud of him because he was so old, old men because he was so young. I fancy, though we hardly confessed it, we had a feeling it was eminently creditable to us to be able to breed so fine a specimen of an octogenarian. We cited his shrewd wit, his devil-may-care courage, his personal loyalty to his friends. I am not sure, even, we did not secretly cite his good-humored scepticism on abstract truths, his lack of faith in political principles. Still, all these characteristics may explain why a highly civilized and perhaps even cultured society liked him without greatly respecting him. But they will not explain the affection of the people. He might go where he liked, whether to the agricultural or in the manufacturing districts, and the working-men would walk for miles and miles and flock in multitudes together to catch a sight of that pleasant, homely face. No English popular tribune had ever such a following as awaited this kindly cynical aristocrat in his later years. As far as any one cause can be assigned for this strange regard that the nation bore him, I believe it arose from the conviction that he was emphatically an English minister. You must have lived very long in England before you appreciate in its full strength the pureness of our national feeling. We can pardon almost anything to a statesman who serves England before all and above all. We know of no forgiveness for a man who is suspected, rightly or wrongly, of preferring the interests of another country to those of our island land; and of this sin no one except some Russo-phobist lunatic, like Mr. Urquhart, ever suspected Palmerston. Both for evil and for good he was a representative Englishman. If the welfare of the human race had lain on one side and that of England on the other, he would have preferred the latter without a moment's hesitation. But, on the other hand, he would, I think, have hesitated as little if his own welfare had been balanced against that of his country. It was this dogged, warm patriotism which especially endeared him to the country. His standard was not a high one, but such as it was, he acted up to it faithfully and loyally. In the preface to her last work, "Napoleon III. in Italy," Mrs. Barrett Browning wrote:

"I confess I dream of a day when an English statesman shall arise with a heart too large for England, having courage, in the face of his countrymen, to assert of some suggested policy, This is good for your trade; this is necessary for your domination; but it will vex a people hard by; it will hurt a people further off; it will profit nothing to the general humanity; therefore, away with it; it is not for you or me."

Now, Palmerston was the very representative type of the patriotism the poetess thus assailed. It was, I fear, exactly because he was so, that his name is dear to Englishmen—dear as those of Nelson, and Pitt, and Wellington. I am not saying that our hero-worship is of the noblest form, or that our idol was the worthiest, even in a low grade of idolatry; but I do say, our superstition, if you call it so, was of a kind that Americans, more than any other nation, ought to judge of leniently.

However, in a living world like ours, the dead must bury their dead, and future years may well be left to decide the question whether the dead Premier had about him aught of true greatness. He is gone, and an era has closed with him. By the mere force of his personal popularity he kept alive the traditions of a by-gone time; he retarded the action of forces that had sprung into existence during the last thirty years. Though nominally a Liberal, he was, in the true sense of the word, the most conservative of ministers. With him there has died out the policy of the old anti-reform-bill period, the statecraft of the great Napoleonic time of struggle. The aristocratic rule has lost its ablest defender, the party of progress its most dangerous opponent, in the person of Lord Palmerston. And, therefore, the breath had scarcely left his body before the one question which everybody was asking, was not so much who would succeed him, but what would be the policy of the new government.

It is a striking proof how little even those in daily contact with him had seriously contemplated the imminence of Lord Palmerston's death, that no arrangements whatever had been made for filling up his place. The ministers were almost all away from London, many of them out of England, when the Premier died, and the Queen was in the Highlands. Still, there was not much doubt about who would be called upon to form a ministry. The choice practically lay between Earl Russell and Mr. Gladstone. Had the vacancy occurred before the last election, Lord Derby would probably have been sent for by the Queen. But in the face of the overwhelming Liberal majority returned by the country, the idea of a Conservative government was for the present out of the question. In the ranks of the Liberal party the only two available candidates were the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Foreign Minister. Just as on a race-course there are always people who place their confidence in a rank outsider, so in politics there are always quidnuncs who have certain information that something is going to happen which nobody expects. By these authorities all sort of rumors were circulated as to the Premiership having been offered to Lord Granville, or Lord Clarendon, or Lord Wodehouse. But I believe the only serious discussion was as to the respective merits of Russell and Gladstone. The first object was to form some temporary government as rapidly as possible. With a new and untried Parliament, any administration now formed must necessarily be of a doubtful tenure of life. It was, therefore, thought desirable to patch up the present ministry as quickly as possible, and to defer any fundamental changes till after the opening of the session. With this end in view, Earl Russell was, no doubt, the best Premier to choose. With his historic name, his great experience, and his immense family connection, he stands so high that his colleagues could hardly object to serve under him. Whereas, if Mr. Gladstone had been called to the front at once, he would have encountered extreme difficulty in persuading many of his colleagues to accept a subordinate position. It is now tolerably certain that Mr. Gladstone has consented to act with Earl Russell, he assuming the leadership of the House of Commons. If this is so, I do not expect any great change at present in the personnel of the ministry. Lord Clarendon, it is said, will succeed Earl Russell at the Foreign Office, and Lord Granville will become our minister at Paris in lieu of Lord Cowley. But about all this nothing definite is settled, and therefore, I need hardly say, nothing positive is known.

Meanwhile, I feel convinced that the Russell-Gladstone cabinet can only be regarded in the light of a stop-gap. In the House of Lords any Liberal ministry is always in a minority; but this of itself is of no great importance, except in as far as it renders the presence of the Premier less pleasant to the Upper House. The real question is whether the new cabinet has any chance of holding its own in the House of Commons. No doubt the Liberal majority is a very good one upon paper; but then it includes men as different as Mr. Bright and Mr. Lowe, Mr. Potter and Lord Elcho. Of the ministerial phalanx, I should say, at the very least, a hundred sat on the right hand of the Speaker, not because they are Liberals, but because they are or were Palmerstonians. Now, I have no belief that their allegiance will be transferred at once to Mr. Gladstone, whom they disagree with as much as, perhaps more than, they do with Mr. Disraeli. Then, too, an assembly used to the easy, genial good-nature of the late Premier will not tolerate, easily or readily, the ascendency of a statesman like Mr. Gladstone, whose weakest points are a want of temper, exaggerated earnestness in matters of minor importance. If from Chancellor of the Exchequer Mr. Gladstone became Premier, the responsibility of the position he has so long ambitioned might possibly give him a prudence and temper he has not yet manifested. But as leader of a ministry whose Premier sits in the House of Lords, he will not have the authority requisite to a very difficult position. It is not as if Earl Russell was a cipher, in whose name Gladstone could act. Palmerston was powerful enough not to be jealous of the position of his great finance minister; but "Lord John," as the public still calls him, is not big enough, morally as well as physically, to be content to allow a subordinate to occupy the chief post of the ministry in such a manner as to obscure his own importance. Moreover, there is one fatal rock ahead, on which I think the new ministry must make shipwreck. Either they must postpone all idea of reform, in which case they lose the support of the advanced Liberals, or they must introduce a reform bill, in which event they split up the Liberal majority. If I had to make a prophecy, it would be that, before next year is over, we should see a Conservative government in power, and that then Gladstone would become the leader of an united Liberal opposition.

With regard to American affairs, I think Lord Palmerston's death will not be without importance. In a cold and ungracious way Earl Russell has been all along a friend of the Federal cause; while, in a pleasant and careless way, Lord Palmerston, as far as he had any sympathies at all, sympathized with the South. But yet I think it is a blessing for England that Palmerston and not Russell was in power during the last four years. No other Premier could have resisted so successfully the cry for intervention which at one period was so prevalent in the House. As long as Lord Palmerston recommended the maintenance of neutrality, even the warmest partizans of the South acknowledged that the course he recommended could not be inconsistent with the national dignity. But any supposed accession to foreign demands would have far less chance of acceptance if endorsed by Gladstone or Russell instead of Palmerston.

"NEW YORK SOCIETY."

THE subject of society in New York has been a puzzle to those who think on social subjects. New York itself is such a changing phenomenon, made up of such constantly shifting elements, that what one says of it to-day will hardly be true to-morrow. We think, however, it must be admitted that, in the best sense, New York society has not been thus far a success, that is, if one compares New York with a European city—London, for instance. A cultivated man, or a "family man," of hospitable habits and moderate means, does not get the same social satisfaction out of life here which he would there. In fact, most men of this stamp with us, after a few years of experience, give up even the expectation of "society" in the European sense, and subside into their own families and literary pursuits, or devote themselves to business and public objects.

Of course, we except from this statement certain persons not sufficiently defined yet even to be called a "class," such as public men or literary men of large means, who entertain much and freely, and a few very refined families, who have inherited some property and habits of hospitality. These people really gather about them "society," which they see in a pleasant way, and which brings forth its very best at their tables. Some circles of this kind in New York could not be exceeded in the world for vivacity, grace, and intelligence, and for the knowledge and interest in general affairs which is the great charm of life in large cities. Relatively to the population, we believe there are still more of these in Boston than in New York. But such little nuclei of society do not give it its character. The mass of the middle-class in our city are not at all of this kind, socially considered. In means, they are better off than the corresponding class in England. They live in handsomer houses, and have richer furniture, though showing less equipage—probably, on the whole, spending more annually, and more easily recruiting their means from losses or extravagance. But they do not get as much with their money. Their current idea of "society" is a grand ball once a year, or a "party" in the evening, where the crowd, of course, prevents anything like conversation, but where the hosts perform their social duties in one grand annual act of sacrifice. For the rest of the year, their magnificent drawing-rooms are shut up, cold and dark, and they receive a few chance callers in the "library," or a small closet off the hall—the lady's "boudoir."

Evening visiting is out of the question in such houses. The very aspect of an unused stately room, just lighted up for your benefit, and only half-warmed, freezes conversation; and the gentlemen who courageously make a few such efforts become disheartened, and give up "society" for clubs. In such houses there is seldom a dinner-company, or lunch-party, or breakfast for guests; there is really no lively conversation, no sparkle of wit, and eager furnishing each of his stores of experience, anecdote, and knowledge, so far as guests are concerned.

Society is a throng of people, just exchanging salutations and admiring or criticizing beautiful toilettes, and crowding to a very late and rich supper. We would not in this be understood as objecting to levees or balls. It is something for people in a large city just to see and exchange a few words with so many acquaintances, whom they could not otherwise meet. Then pretty toilettes, lights, flowers, music, and the dance, are pleasures which no one would wish entirely to lose; but all that we urge is, that they are not "Society." One of the greatest pleasures of life, to a social man, is to see a few intelligent men and women about a table. Wine and good cheer warm the wits; men forget their cares and selfishness at a dinner; the day is over, and the faculties which business and anxiety have closed, open at the genial touch of easy social sympathy; the quick joke flies to and fro; the generous statement, the lively argument, the story of adventure, the thousand novelties of the day circulate through the little company, and at an early hour the guest is back at his home, not broken of his rest or his digestion ruined by a late supper, and fresher the next morning for his work.

Or, if the host is so circumstanced that he cannot give a dinner, a "lunch-party" or a breakfast is a pleasant substitute, bringing men of like sympathies and of thought together, and really drawing out conversation. Man was made to talk as he eats, and the taking the food alone and morosely is one of the well-known indications of barbarism, seen now among our Southern field-hands and in savage tribes.

The fault with dinners in New York is, that people attempt too much and are too extravagant. No dinner seems to be thought en règle without champagne and a dozen courses. But the fact is, the majority of people would prefer a few excellently cooked dishes and one good wine, with a hearty and easy manner, to all the doubtful wines and badly-cooked experiments which make up some of our grand dinners. Then, moderate people cannot give expensive dinners, and so give none at all, which is a great mistake. How often does a stranger in New York receive that most doubtful of hospitalities—the invitation "to come in and see us at any time," or, as we knew in one case, "come to my office!"—merely because his friend could not give a handsome dinner, and was a shamed to inviteto a plain one. In England, one is invited often to good family dinners, or plain meals where very pleasant people meet, many persons getting over the difficulty of a formal dinner by a lunch or a breakfast. The result of our habit is that there are few houses where society, in the best sense, gathers year after year. New York has an abundance of intelligent, lively, agreeable men and women of the world, but there is great difficulty in getting them together. They are scattered, busy, distrait. After a while, having abjured balls and forsworn party suppers, they drop out of society, and one hardly knows where they are. We see them, indeed, at occasional meetings of a more important kind, and now and then at clubs, but to fairly pin them down to a table and "have a chat" with them, we seldom succeed. The consequence is, New York society exists, like her up-town districts, in a most broken and chaotic condition, mainly interesting as showing what it will be hereafter. Even clubs do not remedy the evil, though they are rapidly drawing young men from the inane life of balls and levees; one reason of their want of success being that they are not sufficiently dining-clubs, and another that their sociality requires late hours, heavy smoking and punch-drinking, which are not favorable habits for the work of the next day, not to speak of their moral tendency.

What we need in New York is a more general and simple hospitality and a stronger sense of the responsibility of people of means in the matter of showing it to others, as well as returning it. There is no city in the world where there is so little conscience about accepting and giving back hospitable favors. People accept one's invitations (or disregard them) year after year, and it never seems to occur to them that they must do anything in return. You never hear of a dinner or even a "party" at their house. And some of them, to escape even the appearance of obligation to entertain, fly to hotels, that most self-indulgent refuge for lazy housekeepers.

The two great obstacles, however, in the way of forming a hospitable and agreeable society in New York are, first, the want of permanence of people in their homes; and, second, the lack of trained servants.

Where the whole population changes its residence every five years, and a portion often every year, there cannot be much permanent society. One does n't know where people are; we lose trace of our friends for three months out of the eight they are in town. The rich of to-day are the men of moderate means to-morrow, and live in a different style. We fall out of the habit of "dropping in" to certain houses, which have always been occupied by the same families, as is the pleasant experience in London, and somewhat in Boston. Society, to be good, needs solidity, permanency.

Then, with our raw, awkward servants, our wives and sisters dread to give dinners, and so we drop out of the habit of and finally the taste for hospitality, and at last lose the flexibility and ease which true society requires. Our community, besides, contains a large number of very active, clever men of business, who have not had culture enough to make them appreciate social intercourse. They are willing sometimes to make a display, but intelligent, cultivated conversation, and the mental effort of entertaining, they do not care for, and would rather avoid. There is no class here that lives solely for social life, as in England and France. Few people have the long experience and tact in bringing out and attracting men and women of mark which Europeans show, and which is transmitted in the foreign social system. One measure of the civilization of a country is the value it sets on society. We have not reached as yet the point of complete culture in this matter which belongs to older communities.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

A CREDITABLE literary enterprise is announced by Messrs. T. & T. Clark, of Edinburgh, of a kind that we should least expect from what the laureate calls "the grey metropolis of the north." Scotland, the headquarters of Presbyterianism, where popery and prelacy were alike held in equal horror, would seem to be relenting from its ancient severity, when a "Library of the Christian Fathers of the Ante-Nicene Church" is actually to appear under the auspices of one of her leading publishers. Messrs. Clark have done good service to theological literature by their numerous translations from German divines and commentators, and have probably been encouraged by the success their "Foreign Theological Library" has met with to attempt this new undertaking. The "Library of the Ante-Nicene Fathers" is intended to present translations of all the extant writings, after the New Testament canon, that appeared before the Council of Nice, with the possible exception of the commentaries of Origen, on account of their bulk; but these also will be given if the series meets with success. It will include works of doubtful paternity, though of unquestioned antiquity, as "The Apostolical Constitutions," etc. Introductory critical and biographical notices will be given with each work, and accuracy of translation will be assured by the employment of competent scholars, among whom we are glad to see the names of James Donaldson, author of a "History of Christian Literature," the first volume of which was recently published by Macmillan, and Dr. Alexander Roberts, author of "Dissertations on the Gospels." It is calculated that the series will make about sixteen volumes. Full indexes, etc., will be given at the completion. The Oxford "Library of the Fathers," the only other collection of the kind in England, is more general in its scope, coming down as late as the time of Gregory the Great. It now comprises forty volumes. Many of them have found a large sale, and had the series been well managed it would have met with success. Being, however, the property of Dr. Pusey, who has sunk a large fortune in it with very inadequate returns, it has not been conducted with the business tact that an energetic publisher could employ, many of the volumes being suffered to go out of print, etc. The growing taste for the study of Christian antiquity is shown by the co-existence of two works of this class. Messrs. Clark's undertaking promises well, and will meet with many supporters in this country.

—Gustave Doré, that wonderful artist, is keeping up the reputation for facility of execution already acquired by his astonishingly numerous works. His Bible, "La Sainte Bible d'après le Vulgate, avec des Desseins par Gustave Doré," is already completed at the press of Messrs. Mame & Sons, of Tours, and will be published in London and Paris early in the present month. It forms two volumes folio, with two hundred and thirty full-size plates, and hundreds of additional vignettes and minor illustrations interspersed with the text on every page. With characteristic love for the terrible, M. Doré has made two drawings of the catastrophe that befell the party who scaled the Alpine height of the Matterhorn; one representing the ecstacy of success, and the other the dreadful accident that caused the loss of four lives. They portray with wonderful ability the majesty of nature contrasted with the comparative insignificance and fragility of man, though it is probable it was less the artist's intention to point a moral than to illustrate a striking and painful incident from the wealth of his unbridled imagination.

—After a long interval, Mr. John Russell Smith has recommenced the issue of his "Library of Old Authors," with much spirit, by an edition of the writings of a genuine English worthy, Roger Ascham, whose "Whole Works, now first collected and revised, with a Life of the Author, by Rev. Dr. Giles," form four volumes of the usual size. He is also bringing out new editions of Chapman's "Homer's Iliad," and the "Morte d'Arthure," both of which were out of print. It is to be regretted that so late a version of "The History of King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table" as that of 1634 was adopted for this valuable series. It was probably done with the idea that it would make a more readable book, but there is a charm in the rugged simplicity and naïveté of Caxton's edition of Sir Thomas Malory's romance, as reprinted by Southey, in two volumes 4to, 1817, that renders it far superior to the later dilution by succeeding story-tellers. The primary form of these legends, too, is in all respects more interesting to the antiquary and the philologist. A delightful volume as an aid to the study has just been published by Mr. Furnivall, well known for his services to old English literature. It contains the metrical romance of "La Morte d'Arthure," printed from a manuscript in the Harleian collection, the earliest form in which the story exists in English. The text is accompanied by an excellent glossary, and a prefatory essay on King Arthur by the late Herbert Coleridge, the first of an intended series, stopped by his premature death, full of information and fine critical sagacity.

—The success met with by Miss Bunnètt's translation of Grimm's "Life of Michael Angelo" (though not entirely well deserved, as our critical columns have shown) has led to her undertaking for the same publishers, Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., a version of "Raphael Santi: His Life and Works, by Alfred Baron von Wolzogen," to form one volume crown 8vo. To the English and American public we believe the name of this biographer is new, the life by Passavant being generally accepted as the chief authority on Raphael and his works. The same publishers announce a work with an attractive title for lovers of diablerie, "The Book of Were-Wolves," by Sabine Baring Gould; it is probably a collection of northern legends gathered by the writer in Iceland, on which island he has published a handsome illustrated volume. Also, a new series of "Reminiscences, by Captain Gronow," whose gossip pleasantly recalls the days of the Regency, and "Three Years among the Working Classes of the United States during the War," a subject that if honestly treated, will have interest for both sides of the Atlantic.

—Mr. John Stuart Mill's two articles on "The Philosophy of Auguste Comte" and "Positivism," which lately appeared in the "Westminster Review," are being republished in a handsome octavo volume of 200 pages, by Trübner & Co., of London. They are accounted among competent judges as ranking with his best works; and will provoke less controversy and difference of opinion in England than was excited by the criticism of Sir William Hamilton. Beyond the Tweed, the justice of Mr. Mill's strictures on that philosopher is universally disallowed. The article in the last number of the "North British Review" on the controversy, and Dr. McCosh's forthcoming book, are only some of the symptoms of the energy shown by his countrymen in their defence of Hamilton's character as a metaphysician and logician.

—The verbal criticism that expended itself in attempts to collate from various sources a perfect text of a classic author, has long been a subject of undeserved ridicule. A late writer, Hon. J. Leicester Warren, has just shown, by an article in the "Fortnightly Review," how wide a scope there will be for our posterity for the exercise of the same class of researches, even in the case of one of our best known and most popular poets. The paper is entitled "The Bibliography of Tennyson." Commencing with the small volume "Poems by Two Brothers" (1827), attributed to Alfred and Charles Tennyson, and so scarce as to be "the greatest prize for collectors of this literature," and Alfred Tennyson's prize poem, "Timbuctoo" (1829), he reviews the various editions of his poems, noting very briefly some of the prominent changes of the text, the poems omitted or remodelled, etc., and their progress to their present form of permanence. Thus, in the volume published in 1830, "Poems, Chiefly Lyrical," the germ of the current collection, when the author was nineteen, are one hundred and fifty-five pages. Sixty-two of these are retained in the standard edition of the "Poems;" the remainder have been discarded by the author, including the remarkable effusion, "The Supposed Confessions of a Second-rate Sensitive Mind not in Unity with Itself," a deeply pathetic poem with many exquisite passages; "The Mystic," in blank verse, "a truly marvellous effort for the mind of a boy of nineteen," in this strain:

> "He often, lying broad awake, and yet
> Remaining from the body, and apart
> In intellect, and power, and will, hath heard
> Time flowing in the middle of the night
> And all things creeping to a day of doom," etc.

and "Love," of which the first stanza is,

> "Thou foldest like a golden atmosphere
> The very throne of the eternal God;
> Passing through thee the edicts of his fear
> Are mellowed into music."

A stanza, since suppressed, in "The Palace of Art" will show how early, in advance of the philosophers, the broad harmonies of creation were apprehended by the poetic instincts of the writer's mind:

> "All nature widens upward, evermore,
> The simpler essence lower lies,
> More complex is more perfect, owning more > Discourse, more widely wise."

The picturesque astronomical stanzas of the same poem, first given in the edition of 1842 and afterwards suppressed, must not be omitted:

> "Hither, when all the deep unsounded skies
> Shuddered with silent stars, she clomb,
> And, as with optic glasses, her keen eyes
> Pierced thro' the mystic dome.
> "Regions of lucid matter taking forms,
> Brushes of fire, hazy gleams,
> Clusters and beds of worlds, and bee-like swarms
> Of suns and starry streams,
> "She saw the snowy poles of moonless Mars,
> That marvellous round of milky light
> Below Orion, and those double stars
> Whereof the one more bright
> "Is circled by the other," etc,—

all showing the same love for contemplation of the cosmos, as seen by the mingled lights of philosophy and poetry. The majority of the miscellaneous poems took their present shape in 1842, after much rewriting and number less retouchings. In the edition of 1851 several poems are revived that had been dropped since 1830. To "The Princess" one hundred and seventy lines of blank verse and several of the lyrics have been added since the first edition in 1847. "Maud" has been considerably altered and remodelled; but it is worthy of notice, psychologically, that there have been only five or six alterations made in "In Memoriam" since its first appearance in 1850. As mere studies of poetic manipulation, all the variations of these different editions should be collected, and doubtless will be at some future day. Whether the exquisite taste in polishing and resetting his gems, shown by Tennyson, does not degrade the author from the rank of a poet, carried out of himself by the rushing fire of inspiration, to that of the mere artist whose distrust in his own impulses leads him to over-refinement in the mere workmanship, is a question for his admirers to settle. Mr. Warren does not notice (we may mention) the savage answer to Bulwer Lytton's attack on Tennyson, in the "New Timon," in which the baronet is contrasted with the lion-hearted old Timon, as "the padded man who wears the stays," etc. It appeared in Punch, and is probably a unique specimen of personal satire by the poet.

—The Narragansett Club, of Providence, R. I., are preparing to issue, in fac-simile, reprints of the various writings of Roger Williams, the apostle of religious liberty. In so doing they will confer a benefit on historical literature, and set an example worth following to other literary societies whose funds are too often wasted in undertakings of little intrinsic value. The works of Roger Williams are so scarce that no library in the world possesses them all. They consist of seven distinct publications, most of them in small quarto, including his "Key to the Language of America" (1643), the first attempt in English to preserve or illustrate any of the Indian dialects; and his "Bloody Tenent of Persecution Discussed" (1644). Of one of the greatest personal interest, addressed to his wife on her recovery from a dangerous sickness—"Experiments of Spiritual Life and Health, and Their Preservation" (1652)—only two copies are known to exist, one in Philadelphia and the other in the choice collection of Mr. Barlow, of New York, to whom it came among Col. Aspinwall's books on America, that were only partially saved from a fire in Broadway last year. Of another book of Williams's, an account of his controversy with the Quakers, "George Fox digged out of his Burrow," etc. (1676), a quarto of 327 pages, only a single copy remains, now placed in the library of Harvard University. The propriety of rescuing from the chance of total destruction historical monuments like the works of Roger Williams needs no insisting on, and, if rightly managed, the enterprise might become a source of income instead of being an expense to the society.

—The death, on the 6th of October, of Dr. Charles Richardson, author of "The New Dictionary of the English Language," at the age of ninety-one, removes from us probably the most aged literary man of the present generation. His "Dictionary," it is well known, was first made public in the columns of the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana," and first appeared in a separate form in two volumes quarto, in 1836. He also published "Illustrations of English Philology" (1805) and "On the Study of Language" (1854). They show no grasp of his subject, and do little more than retrace the ideas, often erroneous and exploded, of Horne Tooke. The dictionary partakes of many disadvantages, from the date of its compilation, that a similar enterprise at the present day would be free from. The quantity of old English texts quoted in exemplification of the use of words, made accessible since that time, is probably double what Dr. Richardson was able to consult, and the progress of comparative philology has rendered the portion of the dictionary treating of derivation and etymology of no value. Yet the work will always deserve the merit derived from the intelligent execution of a good plan by all the lights that the author could command. That it could be superseded by a better book, more in agreement with the present state of philology, is certain; that it will be, is more doubtful. Nothing has been heard of late of the great English dictionary projected by the Philological Society. It was to be composed from materials furnished by persons who read through systematically all the ancient authors in the English language, to stated eras, and noted each remarkable or peculiar word as it occurred. The only defect of this plan was, that as the labor above mentioned was to be performed by volunteers there was no security for the average intelligence of the collaborateurs, and as the edifice itself must depend on the perfection of the individual bricks which compose it, a few incompetent persons might seriously damage the unity and completeness of the work.

—Probably no public man in our times has filled a position of equal eminence with Lord Palmerston who could claim so little connection with literature himself or as even inspiring it in others. Though an M.A., and representative for many years of an English university, no lettered associations cluster around his name. When comparatively a young man, he was supposed to have joined, with Croker and other Tory wits, in the somewhat vapid and personal pleasantries with which, in "The New Whig Guide," Messrs. Brougham, Tierney, Lambton, Ponsonby, Burdett, and other opposition members of Parliament were attacked. This, if correct, is a solitary instance; not even a collection of his speeches has ever been published, and though at some periods of his ministerial career he was literally pelted with pamphlets, he was never provoked to a rejoinder outside of the House, where lay his true sphere of action and influence. He inherited none of the blood of Sir William Temple, the author, who was the uncle of the first Viscount Palmerston. It is a curious exemplification of how few generations bridge over the long stretches of historic time, that the grandfather of the man a few days since flourishing in life and vigor was born in the reign of Queen Anne. A fabulous pedigree imputes a far-descended antiquity to the Temples. The real foundation of this branch of the family was, however, honorably laid by the first Sir William, secretary to Sir Philip Sydney who died in his arms at Zutphen. He afterwards settled in Ireland, in which country the family acquired the peerage, now extinct by the death of the late Premier.

—The professorship of rhetoric and belles lettres, rendered vacant by the death of W. E. Aytoun, at Edinburgh, has been filled by the appointment of David Masson, from a crowd of competitors, by Sir George Grey. He resigns for it a similar professorship in University College, London. The foreign look in Professor Masson's name arises from the duplication of the middle consonant, which he is said to have adopted to distinguish him from the numerous "Masons" of whom he was one; in the same way that, in the last century, Malloch softened his name to Mallett, as still found extant among the minor poets of the day. Mr. Masson was born at Aberdeen, in 1822, and has, probably, got through as much literary work as any living man of his age. He was the original projector of "Macmillan's Magazine," and has continued to edit it from the commencement. His most important labor, the "Life of Milton," was undertaken on so large a scale that the one volume published unfortunately remains only a beginning, and no notice has appeared of the resumption of the work.

ATALANTA IN CALYDON.*

THE last serious attempt, previous to this work of Mr. Swinburne's, to produce a tragedy in English founded on a Greek story, and after the Greek form and manner, was the "Merope" of Mr. Matthew Arnold. That two attempts of this sort should be made within so short a space, by poets of so much original power as Mr. Arnold and Mr. Swinburne, is evidence of the strong allurements with which the Greek tragic art still draws those who come within the circle of its charm.

> Graiis ingenium, Graiis dedit ore rotundo
> Musa loqui.

But another sense has given other genius and another style to the modern nations. No modern hands can strike the ancient lyre. The Greek Muse allures her modern votaries but to baffle them. Nature and the human heart are the same as of old; the rules of art do not change from generation to generation; but each generation looks at nature with fresh eyes, its heart beats with new pulsations, and it gives new forms of art to the expression of its thought and of its sentiment. The ancient forms are no longer natural to it. The attempt to reproduce them is foredoomed to the inherent weakness of imitation. At its best it can be nothing more than a high order of jeu d'esprit.

However penetrated with the spirit of the Greek dramatic art a modern poet may be, however great the genius which he may possess, however subtle his skill in adaptation of his thought to the Greek methods of expression, he engages, if he undertakes to reproduce the Greek tragedy, in a task beyond mortal powers. He, moreover, exposes himself to a comparison which can result only in the display of his own inferiority to the great masters whom he follows. His genius may be equal to that of Æschylus, or Sophocles, or Euripides, but it cannot be as theirs. The genius of Goethe, comprehensive as it was, could produce only a German "Iphigenia." No reader familiar with the Greek tragedians would ever take it even for a translation of a Greek drama. The "Phidian Minerva" is not to be remade.

But there are certain things to attempt which is praiseworthy, and manifests a lofty spirit, even though to achieve them be impossible. Magnis excidere ausis might be the well-chosen motto of the poets who try their powers in the production of a drama of the Greek school. For the attempt indicates, if it be a serious one, not only susceptibility to the beauties of one of the highest styles of art in literature, and the possession of a rare culture, but also a willingness to submit to a general failure for the sake of certain partial successes. The poet addresses himself primarily in such an undertaking to a very small audience—to those capable of appreciating merits not obvious to the common reader; he gives up the reward of popularity for the sake of the discriminating praise of a selected audience. He voluntarily relinquishes the sympathy of the mass for that of the few.

Such praise belongs to Mr. Swinburne. For his "Atalanta in Calydon" proves that he possesses powers which, if wisely employed in the production of poetry of modern style, would secure to him a place among the popular poets. His tragedy, however widely read, cannot become, in a true sense, a popular poem. The common reader has not imagination enough, or at least has not a sufficiently cultivated and instructed imagination, to answer to the demand made upon it by a poem so remote in construction and intention from modern interests.

But "Atalanta in Calydon" is, in its own kind, a remarkable and an interesting poem. It shows on the part of its author a genuine appreciation, not merely of the beauty, but of the moral intention of the Greek dramatic art. It gives evidence of a poetic genius of great susceptibility, yet so controlled as to be able to work effectively within imposed limits; of a genius whose original powers have been disciplined and confirmed by the faithful study of noble models; of a strong, quick fancy; and of deep, natural feeling. Perhaps, indeed, the chief evidence of Mr. Swinburne's fit preparation and ability for the special task he set before himself in this work, is the exhibition it affords of the quality mainly characteristic of the Greek drama, and which may be described as the pervading of the whole thought and action by a single prevailing sentiment, by which all the characters are to some degree unconsciously inspired, and to which the course of the story is subordinated. It is this characteristic which explains and renders necessary the unities of time, place, and action, and which gives to the Greek drama its peculiar and altogether special power. It is to this characteristic that the Greek tragic art mainly owes its perennial interest. For while our modern tragedy in its highest displays satisfies the need of the spirit for variety and range of emotion, the ancient tragedy satisfies a no less positive need for simplicity, depth, and concentration of impression. It was the aim of the greater Greek tragedians, and the chief end of their consummate art, to exalt and refine the spirit of man by exhibiting to him "the mastery of the human spirit over its own stormiest agitations . . . and to produce a sentiment of sublime acquiescence in the course of fate, and in the dispensations of human life." But though Mr. Swinburne seems to be fully conscious of the simplicity and concentration of sentiment required in the Greek drama, he has failed to do justice to the nature of the Greek sentiment, by introducing into his tragedy a conception of fate and life very far removed from that which the Greek tragedians in the main present. We shall be better able to illustrate what we mean after giving in his own nervous words the argument of his drama:

"Althæa, daughter of Thestius and Eurythemis, queen of Calydon, being with child of Meleager, her first-born son, dreamed that she brought forth a brand burning; and upon his birth came the three Fates and prophesied of him three things, namely these: that he should have great strength of his hands, and good fortune in this life, and that he should live no longer when the brand then in the fire were consumed; wherefore his mother plucked it forth and kept it by her. And the child being a man grown, sailed with Jason after the fleece of gold, and won himself great praise of all men living; and when the tribes of the north and west made war upon Ætolia, he fought against their army and scattered it. But Artemis, having at the first stirred up these tribes to war against Œneus, king of Calydon, because he had offered sacrifice to all the gods saving her alone, but her he had forgotten to honor, was yet more wroth because of the destruction of this army, and sent upon the land of Calydon a wild boar which slew many and wasted all their increase; but him could none slay, and many went against him and perished. Then were all the chief men of Greece gathered together, and among them Atalanta, daughter of Iasius the Arcadian, a virgin; for whose sake Artemis let slay the boar, seeing she favored the maiden greatly; and Meleager having despatched it, gave the spoil thereof to Atalanta, as one beyond measure enamored of her; but the brethren of Althæa, his mother, Toxeus and Plexippus, with such others as misliked that she only should bear off the praise, whereas many had borne the labor, laid wait for her to take away her spoil; but Meleager fought against them and slew them: whom, when Althæa, their sister, beheld, and knew to be slain of her son, she waxed for wroth and sorrow like as one mad, and taking the brand whereby the measure of her son's life was meted to him, she cast it upon a fire; and with the wasting thereof his life wasted away, that, being brought back to his father's house, he died in a brief space; and his mother also endured not long after for very sorrow; and this was his end, and the end of that hunting."

Mr. Swinburne having been thus happy in the choice of a fable compact with the elements of dramatic interest, has been scarcely less happy in his treatment of it. The action of the drama is confined to the day of the hunt and of Meleager's death. From the opening speech of the huntsman, and the entrance of Althæa upon the scene, the sense of coming woe is felt through the seeming confidence and gladness of the action, and inspires a foreboding anxiety. There is great art in the manner in which the tone of the drama rises, and lifts the emotions of the reader up to the final catastrophe. The little gloom darkens and spreads till it involves the day in blackness. The lyrics of the chorus, which takes the place of the ideal spectator, break the action, while deepening and intensifying its effect. But it is here that our chief objection arises to Mr. Swinburne's conception of the Greek notion of the relation of the gods to man, and of fate and life. The part of the chorus in the Greek tragedies is, speaking generally, to give utterance to the impression which the successive tragic situations would make on one witnessing the scene without passion, but with sympathy for the actors within the bounds of reverence for the controlling gods. The natural direction of its emotion is toward piety. But the chorus in "Atalanta in Calydon," at the moment before the catastrophe, bursts into a lyric of great power and beauty, but wholly against the gods. It is not atheistic but antitheistic, and to our feeling it injures the whole dramatic conception, and is untrue to the Greek model. "None hath beheld God," says the chorus:

> "Who makes desire, and slays desire with shame;
> Who shakes the heaven as ashes in his hand,
> Who, seeing the light and shadow for the same,
> Bids day waste night as fire devours a brand,
> Smites without sword, and scourges without rod;
> The supreme evil, God.
> "Yea, with thine hate, O God, thou hast covered us,
> One saith, and hidden our eyes away from sight,
> And made us transitory and hazardous,
> Light things and slight;
> Yet have men praised thee, saying, He hath made man thus,
> And he doeth right.
> . . . . . .
> Therefore, because thou art strong, our father, and we > Feeble; and thou art against us, and thine hand
> Constrains us in the shallows of the sea
> And breaks us at the limits of the land;
> . . . . . .
> Because thou art over all who are over us;
> Because thy name is life, and our name death;
> Because thou art cruel and men are piteous,
> And our hands labor, and thine hand scattereth;
> Lo, with hearts rent and knees made tremulous,
> Lo, with ephemeral lips and casual breath,
> At least we witness of thee ere we die
> That these things are not otherwise, but thus:
> That each man in his heart sigheth, and saith
> That all men, even as I,
> All we are against thee, against thee, O God most high."

This is very striking and powerful poetry, but it is far from being in harmony with the prevailing tone of religious feeling in the Greek tragic poets. Even in the "Prometheus," where the chorus complains of the hard-heartedness and wrath of Zeus, no such blasphemy against him is found, but, on the contrary, a prayer that

> "Never may the all-ruling
> Zeus put into my mind
> Force antagonist to him.
> Nor let me cease drawing near
> The gods with holy sacrifices;
> Nor let me transgress in words."

The very idea of a cruel and wanton god who is over all, irresistible, uncontrolled, is adverse to the deepest religious conceptions of the Greek tragedians. They represent Zeus himself as subject to Fate. The reply of the pythoness of Delphi, "It is impossible even for god to escape fate," is repeated in the speech of Prometheus, "By no means can Zeus escape what has been fated." And this fate was felt in a dim, imperfect way to be an image or allegory of the absolute, eternal law by which the universe was ordered, an obligation superior to all power, a law to which the lawgiver must submit. Bitter as may be the expressions against the gods, there is nothing which we recall in the Greek tragedy which exhibits the spirit of this passage in Mr. Swinburne's drama.

It might not be difficult to point out in the "Atalanta" other passages of which the tone is more that of modern than of ancient feeling, especially in the mode in which nature is regarded; but, as a whole, the work is remarkably consistent with its design in sentiment and in expression. The fault which will strike most forcibly the majority of readers, is an occasional obscurity of diction, produced in some instances by an unusual collocation of words; in others, by ellipses by which the easy train and connection of the thought are broken, so that a pause of reflection is required to discover the author's meaning. But the fault disappears in the passages of most animation and passion, and in these the diction is always clear, vigorous, and instinct with power. The account of the hunt given by the herald is a noble piece of poetic description. And, indeed, Mr. Swinburne's control over the various forms of verse which he employs, and especially the great and varied beauties of the lyrical portions of his drama, place him high in the ranks of the living masters of verse, and give promise and hope of future poetic triumphs. It is rare, indeed, that the first work of a young man affords such assurance of excellence as this, for the "Atalanta" presents a combination of youthful freshness and abundance, with self-restraint, dignity, and conscious strength. There is neither extravagance in it nor over-excitement, nor, on the other hand, is it marked by any sign of unseasonable maturity. It is in a lofty tone throughout, and the imagination of the poet acts most freely and with most natural expression in the highest regions. If Mr. Swinburne's career should be such as this volume gives us the right to hope, the short list of English poets will be lengthened by the addition of his name.

FROUDE'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.*

No historical work of our time has commanded more attention than this, and this attention is due to a variety of causes. Mr. Froude writes so well that had he chosen a subject of small interest for his labors, he would not have failed to secure many readers; and the subject he selected happens to be one of the most attractive passages of modern history. The history of that England which the world best knows, and which has had so great a part in the leading transactions of more than ten generations, dates from the time that the Tudor dynasty had fairly established itself on the English throne; that is, from the year 1509, when Henry VIII., a young and magnificent prince, with generous thoughts and high aspirations, succeeded his grave and unpopular father, who had reigned by the right of conquest, in fact, whatever may have been thought or said of his parliamentary title and Lancastrian blood. Henry VII. never sat firmly in the seat from which he had hurled Richard III. by the aid of foreign mercenaries and domestic traitors. The crown which Sir Reginald Bray took from the hawthorn-bush at Bosworth Field seems never to have fitted the head of the first Tudor sovereign. Every one knew that his Lancastrian claim would not have served to establish a title to an estate; and that Parliament would have been as prompt to recognize the Earl of Lincoln as King of England, had he been victorious at Stoke (in 1487), as it had been to recognize the Earl of Richmond's royalty after the day of Bosworth. Nothing that Henry VII. did during his reign was calculated to make him popular, and it is probable that nothing that he could have done would have won for him the good-will of either nobility or commons. He was, as old Coke says of him, "an exceedingly wise and politic prince," but it was not given to him to be popular. The country submitted to his rule because it was weary of civil war, which had existed, or threatened to break out, from the day of St. Albans to the day of Stoke; but it would have submitted just as readily to Richard III. or to Lord Lincoln, had the decision of arms been favorable to their cause. When Henry VII. died, England felt as much relieved as Sinbad when he had succeeded in "throwing" the Old Man of the Sea. She had submitted to him because she knew that submission was necessary, and she had no choice in the matter; but she had disliked him none the less because of the fact that he was, as she looked at affairs, a necessary evil.

* "History of England from the Fall of Wolsey to the Death of Elizabeth. By James Anthony Froude, M.A., late Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford." Volumes I.-IV. New York: Charles Scribner & Co. 1865.

Very different was the situation of Henry VIII. Men even forgot that he was the son of Henry VII. in the recollection that he was the grandson of Edward IV., his mother being the eldest daughter of that popular monarch, whom Henry VII. had been forced to marry. He united the claims of York and Lancaster, and for many years he was the most popular of sovereigns. This popularity seems to be well deserved, for he had ability, was of moral life absolutely a pattern for kings, attended closely to his duties, and generally acted justly. Of all the brilliant monarchs of the sixteenth century, Henry VIII., if we look only at the first half of his reign, was unquestionably the best; and his talents were equal to those of Charles V., of Sultan Solyman, and his own daughter Elizabeth, and superior to those of Francis I. and Philip II. Had he died in or about 1528, we doubt if it would have been possible to find in history a more popular king, or one whose popularity would have been better deserved. But toward the middle of his reign a change began, and one of the effects of this change has been to make of Henry one of the most odious of historical personages to the minds of the majority of men, though it did not make him odious to the majority of his subjects—while it is undeniable that when he died he was far differently regarded from what he had been when he began to reign.

Mr. Froude's work opens at the time when it had become clear that a great change had taken place, if not in the king, in the circumstances of his position—say 1529—but there is necessarily much introductory matter, which runs so closely into his general subject, that it is impossible exactly to date his opening. So far as the American edition goes, it embraces the last half of Henry VIII.'s reign, or very nearly those years which form that half of it, the fourth volume closing with Henry's death, at the beginning of 1547. The English edition carries the work down some twenty years later, when Elizabeth had long been on the throne. Though intended to form a whole, which it will form when completed, it really divides itself into three parts. The first part is contained in the four volumes already republished here. The second covers the reigns of Edward VI. and Mary I., including the melancholy episode of Lady Jane Grey. The third will contain the reign of Elizabeth, some nine years of which are treated of in the seventh and eighth volumes. As a whole, the work promises to be voluminous, and probably will make twenty volumes when finished, judging by the number of years that are included in the eight volumes now out. But then it is also luminous, and, considering the extraordinary themes which are handled in it, and the talents of the author, we do not think the extent of the work really can be objected to. Then the volumes yet to come must appear at long intervals, and many who now read the first eight in the warmth of youth will find their blood wonderfully cooled by the time that Mr. Froude shall have written his colophon—if so obsolete a thing as a colophon be mentionable in these fast and changing days.

The seventy-four years that are embraced in Mr. Froude's plan are the opening time of our modern world, the period in which Western Europe, or the northern portion of it at least, achieved freedom of mind, and prepared the way for the establishment of yet greater freedom in North America. The world had got so far forward on the road to grand change that it is certain there would have been a great revolution in the sixteenth century had the Reformation not occurred, and had Luther and Calvin been the victims of measles, or teething, or cholera infantum, or scarlatina. The day on which Guttenberg struck off his first printed sheets not only settled the fact that the world must change, and rapidly, too, but decided the manner in which the change must be wrought. Sentimental people, who think with regret of the alterations that the world has undergone in four centuries, ought to know that it was inevitable, and be thankful that its processes were productive of so little that truly can be called evil. It was as impossible that the world could remain in the "middle ages" as it is that men and women can always be twenty-one and eighteen. Manhood and womanhood are as proper to nations as to individuals; and as the fifteenth century closed, European communities began to feel that they had outgrown that ecclesiastical ascendency which had been proper to them when the priesthood was the most enlightened and intelligent portion of the Christian world. It was no more possible that the ancient system should be maintained than that England's American colonies should remain portions of England's dominion after they had grown to a condition to "set up for themselves." As the American nation would have existed had Washington, Henry, and Jefferson, the Adamses and Hancock, never been born, so would there have been a great and successful revolt of the laity of Europe against the priesthood had not one of the Protestant leaders whose names we now hold in honor ever emerged from obscurity.

Circumstances gave to England the first place in the work of the Reformation. Strike her out of the movement, and we can no more associate with it the idea of success than we can associate it with the idea of the Albigensian movement, which was so completely checked. England, even when most Catholic, was strongly anti-Papal. She felt the yoke of Rome to be a yoke indeed. Hence it was that the revolt against Rome took a peculiar form in England, causing Henry VIII. to seek the maintenance of Catholicism while he sought to crush Romanism. He was no Protestant, though forced to do the work of Protestantism. The Reformation was singularly complicated in England with the fortunes and the passions of individuals, and this it is that gives a strange charm to Mr. Froude's "History." The first four volumes may be called the history of Henry VIII., during about eighteen of the most eventful years of his life and of England's annals. Henry is the central figure of a group of remarkable characters, who, at the distance of more than three centuries, interest us quite as much as we are interested by our most eminent contemporaries. Cardinal Wolsey, Katherine of Aragon, Thomas Cromwell, Anne Boleyn, Cranmer, the Seymours, the Dukes of Norfolk and of Suffolk, Latimer, Gardiner, Katherine Howard, the Earl of Surrey, Lady Salisbury, Cardinal Pole, and many others, are all but living beings to us long after they have slept in bloody graves, or have died by the axe, or at the stake, or from grief. They are the persons who meet us in Mr. Froude's pages, and who excite our sympathies as we see them cast aside or sent to prison and the scaffold. The same interest is created in this instance that Mr. Merivale has created for the Romans in the days of the first and second Cæsars, but with this difference, that Mr. Froude's coloring is the richer, because his materials are more abundant, and we find it easier to sympathize with Englishmen and Christians who were the contemporaries of the grandfathers of the founders of our country, than with Romans and Pagans who died almost two thousand years ago The manner in which the history of the English Reformation was "mixed and brewed" with that of individuals, though unquestionably deleterious to it in a moral sense, gives to it a fascination that it would lack were there nothing but the Reformation itself concerned in the business of change. It is this mixture which renders Mr. Froude's work a grand picture gallery, and will win for it admirers who would never have had the patience to go through a score of volumes on the same subject that should be written in the style of the Chronicles.

Mr. Froude writes from original materials principally, from laws enacted in the Tudor times, and from the correspondence of public men, kings, statesmen, diplomatists, and soldiers. This adds to the excellence of his work, beyond question; and now that England is making known her state papers on a liberal scale, it is not to be doubted that many things that have long passed for truths in her history will be degraded to the place appointed for lies, while things that were supposed to be false will be discovered to be truths. The state papers of other countries are also, to a very considerable extent, open to the truth-seeker. The Simancas collection appears to be inexhaustible. But of this sort of historical material, without undervaluing it, we have this question to ask: How much of it is really trustworthy? Laws, that is, statutes, enacted by legislatures, or other bodies empowered to enact them, speak for themselves, if we know the circumstances under which they came into existence. With correspondence it is not so. That must depend for its value upon the character of the writers—not their reputation, which may be very high; but their character, which may be very low. It is well known that the diplomatists and other public men of former times were by no means so devoted to truth as to wish to see her in all her naked charms. It was never supposed of them that they were ready to jump into very deep wells in the hope of plucking her out of them. These men of the sixteenth century were in an especial sense the most abandoned of liars. They reduced falsehood to a system, and became so very perfect in their art, that, as Varney says to Alasco, having imposed upon all mankind, they at length, in some measure, imposed upon themselves. The trouble is, in using the materials they have furnished, to ascertain to what extent they carried their practice of lying; and until that is done we must confess that we cannot have anything like a profound faith in their writings as historical authorities. Who shall assure the world that the Spanish despatches from London to Philip II. were not seasoned with lies? If we find a Castilian ambassador lying to Elizabeth regularly and on system, is it uncharitable to suppose that sometimes he lied to Philip? And if it is not uncharitable thus to suppose, is it to be too critical to say that these despatches of ambassadors and other similar writings are not precisely that absolutely faultless material which they are commonly supposed to be? If the minister found it for his interest, as he understood that interest, to lie to his master, lie he would to him; and the monarch "near" whose court he resided may have found it for his interest occasionally to give the minister very good and substantial reasons for supplying his employer with falsehoods. We can trust the Venetian relazioni, for their writers had no inducement to be false, and it might have been dangerous to attempt imposition at the expense of the Signiory; but we are not quite prepared to admit that all the ambassadors of the sixteenth century were so conscientiously scrupulous when writing home as never to go beyond facts. Besides, very often they must have been ignorant, or have been victims of deception, and thus they may have been made to write falsely when desirous of setting down only the truth. A critical historian, however, such as Mr. Froude, is entitled to use these materials, but he should use them with much care. On some occasions, as it seems to us, he has relied upon them, to speak moderately, as much as they deserve, and further than we should have been disposed to rely upon them.

Lord Byron declares that wrath and partiality are virtues in a historian, as they make him write in earnest. Mr. Froude cannot be charged with giving way to wrath—quite the contrary, for he maintains his coolness on all occasions, and sometimes, we doubt not, to the indignation of the warm-blooded reader; but he has been accused of partiality, because he has made a hero of Henry VIII., to whom he all but applies, in the historic sense, the English constitutional maxim, that the king can do no wrong. He goes almost as far in one direction as ignorant Romanists do in the other direction, when writing of Henry. We must say that he has sometimes tried our temper severely when he defends some of Henry's worst deeds, as we estimate them; but we are bound to add, that we are convinced that he acts in all honesty, and that he supports his positions with wonderful skill, and by the use of ample resources. If he does not convince his opponents, mostly, he manages to silence them. The course that he pursues with regard to Henry, which he resolved upon after beginning his work, adds much to the interest of his history for readers, whatever may be its effect on it as a work of authority.

The American edition of this work is finely printed, and pleases the eye better than it is pleased by the English edition; but there is something in our climate that is unfavorable to the preservation of good printing, and we use neither so good ink nor so good paper as are used in England, and therefore our most beautiful specimens of typography are often doomed to have but a summer's life; but we are not the less proud to mention the efforts that publishers of good taste make to excel in the most important of all the arts.

MISS BRADDON.*

Miss Aurora Floyd, as half the world knows, was a young lady who got into no end of trouble by marrying her father's groom. We had supposed that this adventure had long ago become an old story; but here is a new edition of her memoirs to prove that the public has not done with her yet. We would assure those individuals who look with regret upon this assumption by a "sensation" novel of the honors of legitimate fiction, that the author of "Aurora Floyd" is an uncommonly clever person. Her works are distinguished by a quality for which we can find no better name than "pluck;" and should not pluck have its reward wherever found? If common report is correct, Miss Braddon had for many years beguiled the leisure moments of an arduous profession—the dramatic profession—by the composition of fictitious narrative. But until the publication of "Lady Audley's Secret" she failed to make her mark. To what secret impulse or inspiration we owe this sudden reversal of fortune it is difficult to say; but the grim determination to succeed is so apparent in every line of "Lady Audley's Secret," that the critic is warranted in conjecturing that she had at last become desperate. People talk of novels with a purpose; and from this class of works, both by her patrons and her enemies, Miss Braddon's tales are excluded. But what novel ever betrayed a more resolute purpose than the production of what we may call Miss Braddon's second manner? Her purpose was at any hazard to make a hit, to catch the public ear. It was a difficult task, but audacity could accomplish it. Miss Braddon accordingly resorted to extreme measures, and created the sensation novel. It is to this audacity, this courage of despair, as manifested in her later works, that we have given the name of pluck. In these works it has settled down into a quiet determination not to let her public get ahead of her. A writer who has suddenly leaped into a popularity greatly disproportionate to his merit, can only retain his popularity by observing a strictly respectful attitude to his readers. This has been Miss Braddon's attitude, and she has maintained it with unwearied patience. She has been in her way a disciple as well as a teacher. She has kept up with the subtle innovations to which her art, like all others, is subject, as well as with the equally delicate fluctuations of the public taste. The result has been a very obvious improvement in her style.

She had been preceded in the same path by Mr. Wilkie Collins, whose "Woman in White," with its diaries and letters and its general ponderosity, was a kind of nineteenth century version of "Clarissa Harlowe." Mind, we say a nineteenth century version. To Mr. Collins belongs the credit of having introduced into fiction those most mysterious of mysteries, the mysteries which are at our own doors. This innovation gave a new impetus to the literature of horrors. It was fatal to the authority of Mrs. Radcliffe and her everlasting castle in the Apennines. What are the Apennines to us, or we to the Apennines? Instead of the terrors of "Udolpho," we were treated to the terrors of the cheerful country-house and the busy London lodgings. And there is no doubt that these were infinitely the more terrible. Mrs. Radcliffe's mysteries were romances pure and simple; while those of Mr. Wilkie Collins were stern reality. The supernatural, which Mrs. Radcliffe constantly implies, though she generally saves her conscience, at the eleventh hour, by explaining it away, requires a powerful imagination in order to be as exciting as the natural, as Mr. Collins and Miss Braddon, without any imagination at all, know how to manage it. A good ghost-story, to be half as terrible as a good murder-story, must be connected at a hundred points with the common objects of life. The best ghost-story probably ever written—a tale published some years ago in "Blackwood's Magazine"—was constructed with an admirable understanding of this principle. Half of its force was derived from its prosaic, commonplace, daylight accessories. Less delicately terrible, perhaps, than the vagaries of departed spirits, but to the full as interesting, as the modern novel reader understands the word, are the numberless possible forms of human malignity. Crime, indeed, has always been a theme for dramatic poets; but with the old poets its dramatic interest lay in the fact that it compromised the criminal's moral repose. Whence else is the interest of Orestes and Macbeth? With Mr. Collins and Miss Braddon (our modern Euripides and Shakespeare) the interest of crime is in the fact that it compromises the criminal's personal safety. The play is a tragedy, not in virtue of an avenging deity, but in virtue of a preventive system of law; not through the presence of a company of fairies, but through that of an admirable organization of police detectives. Of course, the nearer the criminal and the detective are brought home to the reader, the more lively his "sensation." They are brought home to the reader by a happy choice of probable circumstances; and it is through their skill in the choice of these circumstances—their thorough-going realism—that Mr. Collins and Miss Braddon have become famous. In like manner, it is by the thorough-going realism of modern actors that the works of the most poetic of poets have been made to furnish precedent for sensational writers. There are no circumstances in "Macbeth," as you read it; but as you see it played by Mr. Charles Kean or Mr. Booth it is nothing but circumstances. And we may here remark, in parentheses, that if the actors of a past generation—Garrick and Mrs. Siddons—left with their contemporaries so profound a conviction of their greatness, it is probably because, like the great dramatists they interpreted, they were ideal and poetic; because their effort was not to impress but to express.

We have said that although Mr. Collins anticipated Miss Braddon in the work of devising domestic mysteries adapted to the wants of a sternly prosaic age, she was yet the founder of the sensation novel. Mr. Collins's productions deserve a more respectable name. They are massive and elaborate constructions—monuments of mosaic work, for the proper mastery of which it would seem, at first, that an index and note-book were required They are not so much works of art as works of science. To read "The Woman in White," requires very much the same intellectual effort as to read Motley or Froude. We may say, therefore, that Mr. Collins being to Miss Braddon what Richardson is to Miss Austen, we date the novel of domestic mystery from the former lady, for the same reason that we date the novel of domestic tranquillity from the latter. Miss Braddon began by a skilful combination of bigamy, arson, murder, and insanity. These phenomena are all represented in the deeds of Lady Audley. The novelty lay in the heroine being, not a picturesque Italian of the fourteenth century, but an English gentlewoman of the current year, familiar with the use of the railway and the telegraph. The intense probability of the story is constantly reiterated. Modern England—the England of to-day's newspaper—crops up at every step. Of course Lady Audley is a nonentity, without a heart, a soul, a reason. But what we may call the small change for these facts—her eyes, her hair, her mouth, her dresses, her bedroom furniture, her little words and deeds—are so lavishly bestowed that she successfully maintains a kind of half illusion. Lady Audley was diabolically wicked; Aurora Floyd, her successor, was simply foolish, or indiscreet, or indelicate—or anything you please to say of a young lady who runs off with a hostler. But as bigamy had been the cause of Lady Audley's crimes, so it is the cause of Aurora's woes. She marries a second time, on the hypothesis of the death of the hostler. But, to paraphrase a sentence of Thackeray's in a sketch of the projected plot of "Denis Duval," suppose, after all, it should turn out that the hostler was not dead? In "Aurora Floyd" the small change is more abundant than ever. Aurora's hair, in particular, alternately blue-black, purple-black, and dead-black, is made to go a great way. Since "Aurora Floyd," Miss Braddon has published half-a-dozen more novels; each, as we have intimated, better than the previous one, and running through more editions; but each fundamentally a repetition of "Aurora Floyd." These works are censured and ridiculed, but they are extensively read. The author has a hold upon the public. It is, assuredly, worth our while to enquire more particularly how she has obtained it.

The great public, in the first place, is made up of a vast number of little publics, very much as our Union is made up of States, and it is necessary to consider which of these publics is Miss Braddon's. We can best define it with the half of a negative. It is that public which reads nothing but novels, and yet which reads neither George Eliot, George Sand, Thackeray, nor Hawthorne. People who read nothing but novels are very poor critics of human nature. Their foremost desire is for something new. Now, we all know that human nature is very nearly as old as the hills. But society is for ever renewing itself. To society, accordingly, and not to life, Miss Braddon turns, and produces, not stories of passion, but stories of action. Society is a vast magazine of crime and suffering, of enormities, mysteries, and miseries of every description, of incidents, in a word. In proportion as an incident is exceptional, it is interesting to persons in search of novelty. Bigamy, murder, and arson are exceptional. Miss Braddon distributes these materials with a generous hand, and attracts the attention of her public. The next step is to hold its attention. There have been plenty of tales of crime which have not made their authors famous, nor put money in their purses. The reason can have been only that they were not well executed. Miss Braddon, accordingly, goes to work like an artist. Let not the curious public take for granted that, from a literary point of view, her works are contemptible. Miss Braddon writes neither fine English nor slovenly English; not she. She writes what we may call very knowing English. If her readers have not read George Eliot and Thackeray and all the great authorities, she assuredly has, and, like every one else, she is the better for it. With a telling subject and a knowing style she proceeds to get up her photograph. These require shrewd observation and wide experience; Miss Braddon has both. Like all women, she has a turn for color; she knows how to paint. She overloads her canvas with detail. It is the peculiar character of these details that constitute her chief force. They betray an intimate acquaintance with that disorderly half of society which becomes every day a greater object of interest to the orderly half. They intimate that, to use an irresistible vulgarism, Miss Braddon "has been there." The novelist who interprets the illegitimate world to the legitimate world, commands from the nature of his position a certain popularity. Miss Braddon deals familiarly with gamblers, and betting-men, and flashy reprobates of every description. She knows much that ladies are not accustomed to know, but that they are apparently very glad to learn. The names of drinks, the technicalities of the faro-table, the lingo of the turf, the talk natural to a crowd of fast men at supper, when there are no ladies present but Miss Brad don, the way one gentleman knocks another down—all these things—the exact local coloring of Bohemia—our sisters and daughters may learn from these works. These things are the incidents of vice; and vice, as is well-known, even modern, civilized, elegant, prosaic vice, has its romance. Of this romance Miss Braddon has taken advantage, and the secret of her success is, simply, that she has done her work better than her predecessors. That is, she has done it with a woman's finesse and a strict regard to morality. If one of her heroines elopes with a handsome stable-boy, she saves the proprieties by marrying him. This may be indecent if you like, but it is not immoral. If another of her heroines is ever tempted, she resists. With people who are not particular, therefore, as to the moral delicacy of their author, or as to their intellectual strength, Miss Braddon is very naturally a favorite.

WILLSON'S "OUTLINES OF HISTORY."*

Of the manuals of universal history written or published for the use of the American youth, but few deserve a detailed criticism. M. Willson's "Outlines of History" is one of the few. It is the product of both knowledge and labor. Its contents are ample, its narratives well arranged and connected, its style is lucid and pleasing, its chronology, with few exceptions, correct, its geographical notes are abundant and full, and, what is more, its tendency is humane and moralizing, its views of things are mostly fair, and its quotations from standard authors well chosen. But its defects, too, are numerous, and for a "university edition" inexcusable; and inasmuch as it is doing duty very extensively as a school and college text-book, we feel bound to point them out. The principal ones are owing to the following three reasons.

Firstly, the book, which bears on its title-page the date "1864," was "entered according to act of Congress," as the other side of the leaf informs us, "in the year 1854," and has since, as we can easily discover, not been revised. In consequence of this, it not only discontinues the history of the world, commenced "with the first act of creation," on reaching the new epoch inaugurated, in 1852, by the establishment of the second French empire, but it is also completely ignorant of all the important discoveries recently made by archæologists, philologists, and critics concerning some of the most ancient empires of the world. Its chapters on the history of Babylonia, Assyria, and Egypt may therefore be regarded as entirely antiquated, and, in parts, as worse than useless.

Secondly, the author has allowed his theological views to usurp an influence over his pen which is not at all in accordance with the duties of an historian, and especially of a writer for schools. The third part of the work, inscribed "Outlines of the Philosophy of History," indulges in a wide range of decidedly more theological than historical speculations on "the antediluvian world," "miraculous interpositions," "the origin of discord," and "the struggle of opposing races," "coincidences between sacred and profane history," "Bible chronology," "historical prophecies," and chiefly the vision of Daniel concerning "the four kingdoms," as illustrated by the "beasts" of the Revelation, in connection with which we are even told "that most Protestant theological writers suppose that the three great angels described in the Apocalypse were the three great heralds of the reformation, Wickliffe, Huss, and Luther." These curious speculations, embodied in separate chapters, would still be excused as more or less instructive or amusing digressions of an ingenious or fanciful character, but we find with regret that the whole of the Jewish history, in the narrative, is written in the same vein, precluding almost all critical discrimination. Not only are references to prophecies frequent on those pages (68, 69, 198, 225, 244, 285, etc.), and predicted facts sometimes represented as effects of the prediction, but chronology itself is adapted to the wants of orthodoxy, profane history is violently made to agree with the Scriptures, and exaggerated accounts are generally preferred. Thus the Cyaxares of Herodotus—not the later one of Xenophon—is converted into an Ahasuerus, Sardanapalus made to carry away King Manasseh, and consequently to reign after Sennacherib, the Jebusites are supposed to have been Hyksos, and Jerusalem is stated to have been defended against Titus by no less than six hundred thousand men.

But the most vital defects of the work are to be attributed to the third reason, which is the author's excessive care "to keep the attention of the student fixed on the history of the most important nations—grouping around them, and treating as of secondary importance, the history of others"—to bring out "in bold relief the main subjects of history, to the exclusion of comparatively unimportant collateral details," on account of which "he has given greater fulness than would otherwise be possible to Grecian, Roman, German (?), French, and English history," "while the importance of rendering the whole as interesting to the student as possible has been kept constantly in view," causing also the transfer to the notes of much that "could not be introduced into the text without frequent digressions that would impair the unity of the subject." To attain these objects the author has sacrificed so much as to diminish materially the value of his "Outlines" as a universal history. Entire subjects, not to speak of numberless details, have been omitted, or treated in notes, simply because they were not ample or interesting enough to form a separate chapter, and could not easily be connected with other narratives without impairing their unity. A few examples will show what is to be understood by "the exclusion of comparatively unimportant collateral details."

The whole history of China, from the earliest times down to ours, is given in, or rather thrown out, by the following note, appended to a mention of that country in connection with the conquests of Genghis-Khan (p. 286):

"China, a vast country of Eastern Asia, may be almost said to have no history of any interest to the general reader, it has so few revolutions or political changes to record. The authentic history of the Chinese begins with the compilations of Confucius, who was born B.C. 550. From that period the annals have been carefully noted and preserved in an unbroken line to the present day, forming a series of more than five hundred volumes of uninteresting chronological details."

Not even an allusion to the character of those "compilations" of that "Confucius" or of the people; no mention of its peculiar civilization, early progress and inventions, and subsequent stagnation and decay! India and its people, religion, and literature are treated in the same way, in a note appended to the narrative of the conquests of the Saracens (p. 253):

"Hindostan, a vast triangular country beyond the Indus, and south of the Himalaya Mountains—the country of the Hindoos—has no authentic early history, although there is evidence to show that it was one of the early seats of Eastern civilization. The incursion of Alexander (325 B.C.) first made Hindostan known to the European world. In the early part of the eleventh century it was repeatedly invaded by the Mohammedans of Affghanistan."

Jewish history is amply told wherever it can form an interesting narrative, but most indifferently where it ceases to be amusing or exciting. Its post-biblical part is scanty, and gradually dwindles down into nothing. There is no mention of the sects of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes; of Ezra, Hillel, or Gamaliel; of the Mishna, the Talmud, or the mediæval rabbis; of the persecutions or of the literary and commercial activity of the Jews in modern times. Even the history of Herod and his house is entirely passed over in silence.

The history of the Byzantine empire is still more defective, "its annals being so obscure and devoid of interest that we pass them by for subjects of greater importance." And so we pass by, without mention, all the Constantines, besides the Great and his son, all the Leos, the whole period of the inconoclastic commotions, Irene, and almost every other Byzantine name.

The early Christian sects and schisms, the rise and growth of the Roman hierarchy, and its struggles against the imperial power, are equally crowded out. The most celebrated of the Roman pontiffs are not mentioned. The long struggle of Pope Gregory VII. with the emperor is not even alluded to. Neither is his protector, Robert Guiscard, mentioned, or any of the Norman princes of Southern Italy and Sicily, or the event of the Sicilian Vespers. The history of the Italian republics, down to the latest times, is told in a few scattered passages, in which not a single name occurs—no Dandolo, no Doria, no Cosmo, no Lorenzo. Neither can the names of Albert of Brescia, Rienzi, and Savonarola be found.

The history of the three Scandinavian states, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, before the Reformation, is contained in three sentences of the text and in a note attached (p. 308.) The contemporaneous history of Russia and Poland is almost equally poor. Bohemia, Moravia, Servia, and Transylvania, each of which has had its flourishing period of independence and power, are mentioned only as geographical names. The history of Hungary begins with the events of 1848, preceded by an introductory remark on the earlier periods, which, however, ignores such names as Arpád, Saint Stephen, Louis the Great, Hunniades, Matthias Corvinus, Zrinyi, Tökölyi, and Rákóczy.

Nor is the history of the German empire much more complete, in which you look in vain for a mention of Henry III., Henry IV., Rudolph of Hapsburg, Adolphus of Nassau, and Charles IV.! Of German literature there is no trace in this book, though it devotes two hundred and fifty out of its eight hundred and fifty pages to a "compend of the history of civilization."

The treatment of literature and culture is altogether discursive, unsystematic, and defective. Not only such German minds as Leibnitz, Kant, and Hegel, Lessing, Schiller, and Goethe, are passed over in silence, but also Abélard, Descartes, and Spinoza, and such of the ancients as Euclid, Zeno, and Aristippus, Hippocrates and Galen, Zeuxis and Apelles.

Inaccuracies of detail are also of no rare occurrence. We shall notice here a few. In the enumeration of the states of Peloponnesus (p. 21), Arcadia is omitted. For the conquest of Nineveh by Cyaxares we find two different dates, 606 and 612 B.C. (pp. 18 and 67). Severus, "afterwards emperor," who was born after the death of Hadrian, is made to command against the Jews in the reign of the latter (p. 204). Calais, a town of Artois, is placed in Picardy (p. 299). "Gaul" is used for modern France (p. 278); "Turks" for "Moslems," speaking of the seventh century (279). We read of "ancient Greece, Thessaly," etc. (p. 310), the latter of which is comprised in the former. Podolia is incorrectly included in Ukraine at one place 390), while it is correctly mentioned as a separate province at another (p. 528). John Sobieski is designated "the deliverer of Poland" instead of "the deliverer of Vienna" (p. 410). The grand-duchy of Warsaw is called "grand-duchy of Poland" (ib.) Ypsilanti is erroneously stated to have fled to Trieste (p. 516). The modern Greek Odysseus is called Ulysses (p. 518), which is like calling Diana of Poitiers, Artemis of Poitiers. The kingdom of Prussia is designated as an empire, in contradistinction to the kingdoms of Bavaria, Hanover, etc. (p. 539). The Banat is made identical with "Hungary-beyond-the-Theiss" (p. 551), of which it is a division. Debreczin is erroneously placed in South-eastern Hungary. The population of Pesth, which was upward of 100,000 when the book was written, is stated to be about 65,000 (p. 549).

The last-mentioned errors may be attributed to the inaccuracy of the gazetteers used by the author, and his carelessness in verifying their statements. How far he was occasionally misled by them, though his materials generally belonged to the better class, will best appear from a number of notes attached to one page (313), which contain the following: "Bohemia, having Moravia . . . on the south-east," and immediately after, "Moravia . . . lies east of Bohemia;" "Lusatia was a tract of country having . . . Bavaria on the south," on which it never bordered; "Brandenburg the most important of the Prussian states," meaning provinces; "West Prussian Saxony," which does not exist; "the Prussian Empire," meaning kingdom; "Holland has the Prussian German States on the south-east, Belgium on the south, and the sea on the west," which ought to be thus: "Holland has Hanover and Prussia on the east, Belgium on the south, and the sea on the west and north;" and "Rhætia" for "Rhætia."

This last error may be a misprint, as probably are "Piazenza," "Vind*a*bona," "Pel*e*usium," etc., and a small number of false dates. The following, however, we must attribute to that carelessness, mixed with ignorance, so common among us in spelling foreign names: "Radz*v*il," "Czartor*i*ski," "Skr*y*znecki," "Gorgey," "Rossba*c*k," "Torgo*u*," "W*i*rtemberg," "W*i*rtemb*u*rg," "W*u*rtemb*u*rg" (the correct form, Würtemberg, alone does not occur), "C*u*str*i*m," "Kats*b*ach," "Kotzim," "Windischgr*a*tz," "Gross-B*e*ren," "Tessin*o*," "Radets*k*y," "Poi*c*tiers," "Louis Phi*l*lippe" (throughout), "Guadalquiv*e*r," etc., etc. "Frederic" is consistently used of German emperors and dukes, and "Frederick" of Prussian kings. The French accents are generally either wanting, as in "Vend*e*e," "Fr*e*jus," "Lamorici*e*re," and "*e*tat," or misapplied, as in "Caussidi*é*re," "Angoul*é*me," "Barr*é*re," and "Barb*é*s."

In conclusion, we cannot refrain from expressing our opinion that the book well deserves to be issued in a new, thoroughly revised edition.

PALGRAVE'S CENTRAL AND EASTERN ARABIA.*

Chief-Justice Marshall is reported to have said to a lawyer who was talking business against time, "Sir, there are some things which the Supreme Court of the United States should be supposed to know." The range of this inevitable information varies, of course, in different persons, and Mr. Palgrave evidently supposes that a decent courtesy towards his readers implies that the situation of Ma'an is too familiar to them to require explanation. Perhaps our readers are sufficiently up in Arabic geography to justify Mr. Palgrave's assumption, and will find it caviare to be told that Ma'an is situated in the north-western part of Arabia, very near the intersection of the parallel 36° east longitude and 30° north latitude. From this point Mr. Palgrave, who is one of the travellers appointed by nature, sets off on his journey across Arabia with the firm intention, even at the risk of life, of filling up the disgraceful vacancies in the map of Arabia.

It is certainly a blessing to the larger part of mankind that there are a few men whom the blanks on maps affect so poignantly that, after a time, it becomes intolerable, and they say to themselves, as Mr. Palgrave does in his first paragraph:

"It is time to fill up this blank in the map of Asia, and this, at whatever risks, we will now endeavor; either the land before us shall be our tomb, or we will traverse it in its fullest breadth, and know what it contains from shore to shore."

Especially is it a blessing when the traveller is furnished, like Mr. Palgrave, not only with "l'instinct de voyager," but with tact, resolution, thorough general education, and a special knowledge which, in this case, fitted him for his work in an altogether exceptional manner. Able to discuss Arabic literature and Mohammedan theology with their professors in the vernacular—observant, resolute, and enduring, with a fund of deep-seated enthusiasm—Mr. Palgrave's fitness for his work has produced a book of which it is scant praise to say that it is as interesting as a novel. Disguised as a Damascene physician and merchant, he traversed the peninsula in a diagonal direction; was an Arab among the Arabs in speech, costume, and habits, and has given us a treasure of fresh knowledge and suggestion, such as only such accomplishments could have collected. We have heard that Mr. Palgrave is of Jewish origin; that he was a Roman Catholic, as he tells us in his preface; that, at the time of his journey, he was connected with the order of the Jesuits, and that, since his return from the East, he has renounced his Roman Catholic creed, and is now Prussian Consul-General for the East. We cannot vouch for these items, but they imply a variety of culture which accords well enough with the indications of Mr. Palgrave's book.

* "A Narrative of a Year's Journey through Central and Eastern Arabia, 1862-3. By William Gifford Palgrave." London. 1865.

Like other pioneers of sound knowledge, Mr. Palgrave begins by sweeping away the fanciful statements of empirics. The fascinating stories of Bedouin faith; of the ideal nomad life; of the desert maidens, pure as the fountain and wild as the gazelle, vanish before the quiet record of a disposition to treachery requiring perpetual vigilance on the part of the traveller; of filthy and licentious habits, and a freedom permitted to women which fills the streets of an Arab village with shrill chaffering. Against this, on the other side, Mr. Palgrave tells us of the politeness and the prudence of the Arabs, an attachment to form worthy of the fiercest conservative, and a religious bigotry beyond the dreams of Glasgow or the early Connecticut lawgivers.

Indeed, we think the first sensation of most readers will be astonishment at the radical incorrectness of their previous notions of the peninsula. Towns like Djowf, with picturesque walls and watch-towers; Riad, an important centre of population; negro officials in costly clothing of the type of the "Arabian Nights," are not such as one had believed, but are now definite as a photograph, and students of the Eastern question will find Feyrull and Tetal interesting personages. Among other notions which Mr. Palgrave destroys is that of a difference between the camel and the dromedary. He says that the dromedary is only a higher type of camel, but of the same formation—the difference being not between one hump and two humps, but such as between a cart-horse and a race-horse. Lovers of coffee must be content to know that there is no probability that the true Mocha coffee ever reaches Europe, unless they recognize the rounded, semi-transparent grains which Mr. Palgrave describes in the dirty, broken stuff which is handed to amateurs over civilized counters. Arabian horses are placed by Mr. Palgrave at even a loftier point of excellence than was before supposed, but these, also, are never fairly seen out of Arabia.

Throughout the book there are pictures of nature given with most unpretentious brevity: the black desert, the Bedouin praying at sunrise, the "palm-tree cinctured city" will remain vividly in the reader's memory.

Mr. Palgrave's profession of physician gave him means of access to the interior life of the Arabs, of which his readers share the benefit, and his remarks on disease and climate are interesting to the non-medical. He speaks constantly of the delightful climate, "the mistless air," the stars such as only Arabs see—yet his list of prevalent diseases includes chronic bronchitis, rheumatism, and scrofula, in spite of an abundant meat diet.

Occasionally a very good story enlivens Mr. Palgrave's pages. We give one at page 87, of an Arab who was asked, "Who is your God?" "Fadee was," answered the man, naming a powerful provincial governor lately deceased; "but since his death I really do not know who is God at the present moment." My readers (who may, perhaps, remember a parallel saying in North Wales, "When G—— dies Sir Watkin will succeed him") will, I hope, excuse the apparent irreverence of the story. Among other interesting subjects suggested by this admirable book of travel, is the present recession of Christianity from these lands, where it apparently held former sway, and where now the fierce sect of Wahabees proves that virulent fanaticism is of no age or country.

We heartily commend Mr. Palgrave's book. It is long since we have seen one so thoroughly interesting and well written.

UNITED STATES CAVALRY.*

This interesting work commences with a description of the first mounted force authorized by Government, organized in 1793, and gives an account of the gradual development of cavalry until it reached its maximum importance at the climax of our recent war.

Considering that the book was written by a cavalry officer, for the purpose of placing graphically before the public this arm of the service, by recording the results of its battles, and the dashing gallantry of individuals, it deserves a place in every library as a work for information and reference. The descriptions of engagements are brief, and drawn from official reports, and fulsome praise is gratifyingly avoided, which can rarely be said of special military histories, which seem to exhaust the superlatives of the language.

It is amusing to read the serious "provisions for a 'squadron' of cavalry to serve for three years, to be under a major commandant of cavalry, act of March 5, 1792. The squadron was made up of four troops, consisting each of one captain, one lieutenant, one cornet, six sergeants, six corporals, one farrier, one saddler, one trumpeter, and sixty-five dragoons. The pay of the major was fifty-five dollars a month; captains, forty; lieutenants, twenty-six; cornets, twenty; sergeants, six; corporals, five; and privates three dollars a month."

The campaigns against the Creek Indians, in which General Jackson made himself the hero of the day, are agreeably sketched, and afford the reader an excellent insight into the character of that self-reliant and determined man.

The "Black Hawk" and "Florida Wars," and the parts taken by the first and second regiments of dragoons, formed in 1833 and 1836, are described with all their cavalry incidents. The author also gives an account of the Mexican war, and the services rendered by volunteer cavalry regiments.

The name of Lieutenant-Colonel Frémont appears among the battles of California, and the events which led that officer to leave the service.

The special history is relieved by anecdotes of our eminent generals, including Scott, Wool, Taylor, Gaines, and others, when in Mexico.

An extract, portraying the guerrillas, will serve as a specimen of the entertaining and concise style of the book:

"The costume was picturesque, and they were generally mounted on horses which, though small, possessed much spirit, and were capable of enduring great fatigue. These horses were descended, no doubt, from those which were brought to that country by the Spaniards during and even after the conquest of Mexico, and many of them bore traces of Arabian blood. Their progenitors had some of them escaped, or had been reared on the immense plains of North-western Mexico or Texas, where, to this day, large herds of them, perfectly wild, may frequently be seen. Some of the horse-raisers of Mexico have great numbers of horses; and it is related of one widow lady, who had a hacienda near the city of Durango, that she fitted out a Mexican colonel's regiment with a full supply of horses which were perfectly white, all of which was a free gift. The story is so well authenticated as to leave no doubt about it. Their horse furniture consisted of a bridle made of white leather or horsehair, some of which were very beautiful, with an immense bit and curb, which was capable of breaking a horse's jaw by one jerk of the rider. The saddles were also very tastefully ornamented, generally with silver, with a high pommel and cantle. They all carried a long rope, or lasso, called by them a riata, and by our people a lariat."

"The men wore large broad-brimmed hats, which are most unpleasant things to wear in the wind, but which are excellent to shield against the sun's rays. Their jackets were made of leather, velvet, or cloth, and generally embroidered most elaborately by some fair senorita. Their trousers were wide—open at the sides, which were buttoned up by long rows of silver or even gold buttons, and sometimes little bells. They had also tiny bells on their hats and on their immense spurs. Their weapons were a sword, carried under the left leg, whereby it was prevented from dangling about; a pistol or two; an escopet, or short musket, not generally very available; and their lasso, which they could throw with amazing dexterity and effect."

The early military careers of Robert E. Lee, Wm. H. Emory, John Sedgwick, George B. McClellan, and other graduates of West Point who have become conspicuous of late years, are given; and we will close this notice by the mention of the well-known Southern general:

"Robert E. Lee, the lieutenant-colonel of this regiment (the 2d U. S. Cavalry), and since commander-in-chief of the rebel army, a son of 'Light-horse Harry Lee' of the Revolution, was born in Virginia, and graduated at the West Point Military Academy. He was first in the Engineers, and gained a fine reputation in the Mexican war, at the close of which, although but a captain, he had the brevet rank of colonel. For some years he was superintendent at West Point, and held that position when he was promoted lieutenant-colonel of the 2d Cavalry. He served some time with the regiment in Texas, and for a time had command of that department. Lee was not a secessionist at heart, and deplored the sad state of things brought about by the then approaching attempted dissolution of the Union. In a letter to me shortly after the Presidential election in 1860, in referring to it, he says: 'I fear the liberties of our country will be buried in the tomb of a great nation.' His heart was sore over disunion, but this strong man gave way before the tempter, and he, too, took the fatal step which led to the abodes of darkness. Lee was a refined American gentleman, courteous and affable in his deportment, and kindly in his feelings. His personal appearance was striking, and impressed one with the idea that he was a great soldier, which he proved himself to be. He was wounded at Chapultepec."

NEW SCHOOL-BOOKS.*

We had used Andrews and Stoddard's Latin grammar so long, and found it so available for ordinary purposes, that, although we were not blind to its defects, we hardly thought that a better grammar, or one even equally as good, could be written. We were therefore very agreeably surprised to find, upon taking up Prof. Harkness's book, that it was superior in nearly every respect, but especially as regards clearness and conciseness. These qualities are at once noticeable, and there is a lucidity of arrangement apparent in even the smallest details which commends it to the use of the class-teacher. The definitions are all compact and well stated, contain just enough, and are unencumbered with useless verbiage. The rules are general, with the exceptions carefully arranged under systematic heads. Many lists of words are abbreviated or omitted which really contained nothing necessary to be learned, the peculiarities of which could more readily be ascertained by the student from the dictionary. Such are the lists of defective, redundant, and heteroclite nouns. But, so far as we have found, nothing of importance is omitted. The endings in declension and conjugation are printed in heavier type, and present at once to the eye the formation of the various cases and tenses. In the declensions the whole subject of gender has been carefully studied, and the rules and exceptions are systematically arranged; much care also has been given to the rules for the formation of cases in the third declension, and the irregularities are all noted. A new feature is added to a school grammar by the introduction of a comparative view of all the declensions, with a close analysis of their endings, and the demonstration of the manner in which the five declensions grew out of one from the changes occasioned by contraction of vowel and consonant stems. A similar view is also given of the conjugations, with a reference to one simple original form, with changes arising from contraction. The irregularities in the tense-formation of verbs are given with better system and in smaller compass than in any other grammar we are acquainted with. The formation of words is very well treated, although endings are occasionally omitted which are either of frequent occurrence or are found in some one or two common words. Among such omissions are the abstract ending -edo, the noun of place formed from the supine stem by adding -orium, and the characteristic adjective endings -atilis and -icius. The composition of words is a subject that we would gladly have had handled at greater length and with fuller detail.

It is in the syntax, however, that this grammar is especially superior to others. It has not the abundance of examples to be found in Zumpt, nor are all the subjects considered so particularly; but there is a plan which far outweighs these excellences, and the question is thus more lucidly solved in fewer words; what examples are given are carefully selected and illustrate the points. The theory of Latin syntax is first drawn out, and then the syntactical relations of all the parts of speech, nouns, adjectives, verbs, etc., are investigated, which is really a simpler arrangement, though less logical, than a consideration first of the subject and all its modifiers separately, and then of the predicate and all its modifiers. In Zumpt and in Andrews and Stoddard the principles of syntax are stated one after another, as mere individual facts, with little attempt to give them connection and coherence. Here they all crystallize around some central idea. The difficult subject of the subjunctive mood is a most excellent example of this philosophical mode of treatment. In no ordinary school grammar is this topic more thoroughly or more satisfactorily dealt with. Metre and rhythm might have been presented in a better form, and some idea given, as far as is known, of what Latin poetry really was and how it was intended to be read. We also regret that the work was not made more complete by the addition of some remarks and notes on special peculiarities of some of the different parts of speech, especially of the distinguishing uses of various pronouns and adverbs. We are very glad, though, to commend this grammar to the public, for we consider it quite an advance in the art of school-book writing. It is philosophical, and shows the influence of the latest results of philological study.

The Reader by the same author is well adapted for its purpose, though not possessing the great merit of the Grammar. A reader, indeed, ought not to be used in any proper method of teaching Latin. The only really sensible way for boys to study the ancient languages is the same in which all agree that the modern languages should be studied, on the Ollendorff system, or one containing the same principle. A language can be most readily acquired and understood by using it, and by beginning at once to speak and write simple sentences in it a large stock of words is obtained, and a good and continually enlarging acquaintance with the forms of words and the modes of expression is gained. The student is not overburdened at once with rules and exceptions and lists of irregularities, but learns all these gradually as he needs the knowledge. A grammar has its use as a book of reference and a systematic presentation of all the knowledge which should have been previously acquired in a simpler way. The use of grammars and readers solely, and the disuse of Latin in speech or writing, has brought in a system of philological and grammatical study of the language, and has hindered an acquaintance with the literature. Compare the results of the college education of late years and of a hundred years ago. Then graduates kept up their knowledge of Latin and Greek, because they knew the language and could appreciate and understand the literature. Now, in most of our colleges, the students are drilled in verbal peculiarities, and are compelled to study grammar and nothing else, the works which they read being regarded almost solely as a means to that end. The result is that they undergo a fine mental discipline, but know nothing of the author's sentiments or style, because they have never paid attention to them, and are generally unable to translate fluently a page of the easiest book. They do not study the ancient tongues for their own sake, or to acquire any knowledge that those languages are the key to. The study becomes distasteful, and they gladly relinquish it. The method of teaching the ancient languages should be reconsidered and revised, and the study itself less regarded as a mere mental drill. It is well fitted to make a fine scholar, but not to make cultivated men.

The same considerations do not apply to the study of the English grammar. This subject should be taught early and late, for a critical enquiry into our own language cannot be carried too far. Just as it is not essential to a cultivated man to have a minute and accurate knowledge of the nice points of Latin grammar, provided he has a good and general knowledge of its literature, so it is most necessary to every person of broad culture to have a most perfect acquaintance with every nook and corner of English. For such study Mr. Kerl has made a very good preliminary book. His English grammar is better than any of those which are in ordinary school use, and deserves to supersede them. It presents in a convenient form all those facts and principles which it is necessary for the young student to know. There is enough here, if carefully studied and well remembered, to make the scholar a correct speaker and writer, and give him a valuable insight into the theory of our language. The book is intended for schools of the lower grades only, and, therefore, does not enter upon some subjects which can only be understood or profitably studied by those whose general education has made considerable progress. The subject of etymology and derivations is treated, perhaps, rather too slightly, and the history of the language and the older and obsolete forms are hardly considered at all.

Pronunciation and orthography are briefly but sufficiently discussed. It would have been better, if even for form's sake, to have introduced a table of the alphabet and of the sounds of the letters, and we notice a rather singular statement concerning syllables: "Every syllable must consist of one or more vowels, or of one or more vowels enclosed on one or both sides by one or more consonants." We have nothing but praise to give to the grammar until we come to the subject of verbs, and there we do not so much object as question. The verbs are well classified and arranged, unless it be that the scheme of conjugation is deferred too long. Mr. Kerl uses substantially the same system of tenses ordinarily accepted by grammarians under different names. He gives us the six tenses of the indicative under the names of present, present-perfect, past, past-perfect, future, and future-perfect, and three tenses in the subjunctive, the present, past, and past-perfect. He has the ordinary indicative, subjunctive, potential, and imperative moods, besides the infinitives and participles. If we regard the usual theory of tenses as correct, Mr. Kerl's nomenclature, though unusual, is intrinsically good. But tenses are modifications of verbs to show the distinctions of time. Such distinctions of time the present, past, and future tenses show. But the perfect, pluperfect, and future-perfect, as they are usually termed, show the same distinctions of time and the still further distinction of completed action. Would it not, then, be more philosophical to consider these so-called tenses as other forms of the present, past, and future, denoting completed action?

In the Russian language, besides moods, tenses, and voices, there are what are called aspects, one of which denotes completed action, another continuing action, and another simple action. The first would be represented in present time by our perfect, e. g., I have written; the second by our present compound form, I am writing; and the third by the usual present, I write. Aspects or forms of this kind we really have in English. There are in the present tense the indefinite, I write; the progressive, I am writing; the emphatic, I do write; and the completed or definite form, I have written. Similar forms exist in the past tense; in the future the emphatic form is wanting.

According to the author's theory of the tenses, he introduces three into the subjunctive, making use of the pluperfect. His distinctions of time and of the manner in which the present expresses future time, and the past present time, are well thought of, but why does he omit the perfect? It may be unnecessary, but it certainly has at times as much of a subjunctive force as the pluperfect. Some writers would even make a future subjunctive by means of should, which would be equally allowable. In fact, all of the auxiliaries of the so-called potential mood have a subjunctive as well as indicative power, which goes to prove that the potential is really no mood at all, but a mere aspect or form of the verb in every mood, except the infinitive and participle. Here the potential form is in disuse, and we have to substitute some roundabout expression. We think that the theory of the verb would gain greater consistency if this view was adopted, and the potential mood and perfect tenses banished. Still another aspect might be added, the periphrastic form, I am about to write, or I am going to write.

The scheme of conjugation presented in this grammar is imperfect in the omission of the second person singular, and the substitution of the plural in its place. The polite use of the plural for the singular does not make it singular. The different uses of shall and will in the future are not set forth with sufficient distinctness. The distinctions between the predicate use of adjectives and adverbs, in which so many mistakes are made, are, on the contrary, very well marked. The rest of the book is excellent, disfigured by a few slight errors or oversights only. The definition of a preposition in sect. 538 is not quite correct. Compare sect. 543. The distinctions between the different classes of conjunctions are not given. In the example given in sect. 511, the participle does not govern the possessive case, but is itself in that case, and the statement should be corrected. The syntax is very methodically treated and arranged, and its great simplicity is shown to much better advantage than in the ordinary grammars. The examples of false syntax are sufficient and well chosen, and all mistakes in the use of language are reduced to four heads. 1. Too many words; 2. Too few words; 3. Improper word or expression; 4. Improper arrangement of words. This Common-school Grammar, though smaller, is better and more philosophical than the Comprehensive Grammar by the same author, and we hope to see it extensively used, until some better one is written.

American Criticism; or, The "North American Review" and the "Life and Times of John Huss." (American News Company, New York.)—Mr. E. H. Gillett, a Presbyterian minister at Harlem, published, in 1863, a work entitled the "Life and Times of John Huss," which was, in the following year, criticized somewhat sharply by the "North American Review," pointing out some rather striking errors in a book of such pretensions—some of history, some of grammar, some mere misprints, and pronouncing the work, on the whole, to have but little, if any, value. The review was short, and considering the size and character of the work reviewed, the number of inaccuracies cited may have seemed, to people not accustomed to read critically, too small a basis for the sweeping condemnation with which the book was visited. But the fact is, that all narrative works, and especially histories, are valuable only for their accuracy. If they want this, they are good for nothing, let their style be what it may, and their accuracy has to be tested by the same rule as the credibility of a witness. If a witness is mistaken or lies about half-a-dozen points of sufficient importance to have attracted his attention, a judge or jury is released from the trouble of rigidly examining all his other assertions one by one. A cloud of untrustworthiness is thrown at once over everything he says. In other words, the greatest strength of his testimony, like that of a chain, is that of its weakest point. In like manner, if a critic only dips into a book, and finds at haphazard even half-a-dozen important misstatements, errors of dates, of citations, or gross misprints, such as a careful and well-informed writer is not likely to have passed over, he is fully justified in advising the public not to buy or read it. He is under no obligation whatever to search every page for the discovery of proof, which would be merely cumulative, of the author's dishonesty or incompetency.

Mr. Gillett's publishers thought proper after this to resort to a practice for the purpose of pushing his book which, however "energetic" or "enterprising" "the trade" may consider it, ought not, in our opinion, to be permitted, if he has the power to prevent it, by any writer who means, as all high-minded writers ought to mean, to rely mainly on the merits of his work to secure its circulation. They issued, we presume with his sanction, a circular in pamphlet form, entitled "Notices of the Press," containing, first, a preliminary puff of the book by themselves, written in the usual extravagant style, a cross between that of the travelling showman and that of the "explanatory notices" which the dealers print for the edification of the people who come to see their "great pictures on exhibition," followed by extracts from twenty-nine reviews of the book, which had appeared in various journals throughout the country, most of them what are called "religious newspapers." Of course every one of them contained extravagant laudation, many of them just the kind of fulsome, ignorant flattery which to writers of real honesty, conscientiousness, and delicacy of feeling is the most loathsome of inflictions.

We do not mean to say that every one of these "notices" was the composition of persons whose praise was worthless. Several of the journals from which quotations are made do make an honest attempt to criticize books, and when they fail, fail—as writers must now and then fail—through lack of knowledge rather than of high purpose. But the great majority were cut from weekly newspapers whose praise or blame of literary efforts is notoriously valueless, and which do not even profess to publish critiques. What passes under the name of "literary criticism" in their columns is simply puffs, put in either to oblige the publisher in return for his advertisements, or for his civility in sending them the book, and is generally written by a "man-of-all-work," who is ready to notice everything from Grote's "Plato" to the last "Child's Book," or else by the editor himself, when he has nothing better to do. The worst offenders in this respect are the "religious" newspapers, and they are just the ones who were bound ex-officio to beslaver such a book as Mr. Gillett's most plentifully with their ridiculous praises. We have no hesitation in saying that the aid which this portion of the press lends every year to the sale of trashy books is one of the grossest and most repulsive forms of dishonesty known in trade.

The "North American Review" commented in strong terms on Mr. Gillett's "notices," and although we think the reviewer was not, perhaps, sufficiently careful in discriminating between the two classes of critics whom the circular quoted, we think his general observations on the taste and morality and trustworthiness of this kind of advertising were eminently just and sensible, and not a whit too severe.

"A second notice" of Mr. Gillett's work appeared in the "Review" last July, charging the author with having plagiarized very extensively from Bonnechose, while giving references to other writers, and quoting various passages from the two authors in parallel columns in proof of the accusation. These passages, as they stand, do certainly seem to furnish primâ facie evidence of pretty extensive appropriation, not only of other men's ideas, but even of their language, on the part of Mr. Gillett, aggravated by carelessness in the stealing.

To refute these charges Mr. Gillett, or some good friend of his, has published the pamphlet which lies before us. Seventeen pages out of twenty-eight are devoted to abuse of the "North American" reviewer, in the common newspaper style. He is "ignorant," "shallow," "superficial;" guilty of "downright falsehood, coupled with slander;" "assuming," "dull," "commonplace," a "pedant;" he is "uncomfortable in standing alone;" he is "abusive," "undignified." The author of the pamphlet "smiles at his irritation," and so on. Finally, he is accused of being "venal," though who was likely to pay him for attacking Mr. Gillett's history does not appear. Ten pages only are devoted to the refutation of the charges against Mr. Gillett's literary honesty. The sum and substance of it is that wherever Mr. Gillett has copied Bonnechose, Bonnechose had himself copied L'Enfant or Cochlæus (not Cochle*i*us, as the pamphlet has it). The "North American" reviewer cites nine passages illustrative of his charges; the pamphlet cites six in reply, one of which is not quoted by the reviewer, and maintains, in the first place, that Gillett did not steal; that if he did, Bonnechose and L'Enfant stole too; that where he does not refer to his authorities, it "was not necessary;" that where he does refer to them, it is sometimes merely to show, not that he has followed them, but that he has examined them. The pamphlet is, on the whole, a silly production; the style, tone, and temper would disgrace any man of education, and we sincerely trust that Mr. Gillett has had nothing to do with its appearance. We strongly recommend him, for his own sake, to suppress it. Such a defence would damn any book, and will certainly damn his, as this is just the way in which we might à priori expect a plagiarist to retort on anybody who exposed him.

The Knightly Soldier. A Biography of Major Henry Ward Camp, 10th Connecticut Volunteers. By Chaplain H. Clay Trumbull. (Boston: Nichols & Noyes. New York: Oliver A. Felt. 1865.)—Here is the story of a man, who, without love of war, became a soldier, and gave up to his country's need peace, friends, ambition, and, at last, life; who died as he lived, purely, unselfishly, religiously. It is our pride and our joy that such a story cannot be new to any one who knows the history of our late struggle; that such a man is but one impersonation of the generosity which animated thousands of our war's memorable and immemorable dead. But it is not the less to be studied for these reasons, but rather the more, for whoever reads this life of Henry Camp can hardly fail to have his faith in men strengthened, and all his good impulses quickened. There is electricity in good and great lives that makes their contact healthful and invigorating, and we commend this book to all people who lead little, and poor, and doubting lives, as an excellent tonic.

The biography is written by one who was the closest friend of this knightly soldier in his life, and who, after his death, celebrates his goodness and bravery discreetly and well. Indeed, Camp is, for the most part, suffered to tell his own story, and to reveal his own character, in the constant extracts from his correspondence, from the letters to his family and to friends, in which he expresses himself always with easy and graphic effect, and with an unreserve and unconsciousness of great value to the reader. One learns much from this book which one cares to know of the feeling of men in battle and the dangers of war, as well as those objective phases of the soldier's life with which books more commonly make us acquainted. The hero had nothing morbidly introspective in his nature, but he made that study of himself in the experiences of combat, of prison, and of flight which would naturally employ the thoughts of a man of quick intelligence, and he modestly and unambitiously noted the result in the familiar letters here given. Much that he wrote is now also valuable as contribution to the history of events, of which he was part; but it has chiefly the moral and æsthetic uses to which we have alluded.

There is too much good sense and good taste on his biographer's part to suffer anything like working up an interest in the progress of the knightly soldier, but the feeling is inevitably intensified as the narrative draws near its close with his death before Richmond, and the biographer describes with a true and manly pathos the last parting with his friend. He was oppressed with a heavy presentiment that Camp would not return alive from the attack into which he was going, and after once bidding him farewell could not resist the impulse to run after him and take yet a later leave. The chaplain says of himself:

"He turned once more to the left, and pressed on to overtake the major, whom he saw in the advance, pushing his way along toward the furthermost front of death. Every step was an effort. The struggle to reach his friend was almost as the hopeless chase in a nightmare dream. Oh for some superhuman arm to remove the intervening thicket ere the one or the other fell prostrate! At length they were side by side in the deadly race. As the chaplain laid his hand on the other's arm, Camp turned with a loving look of glad surprise. 'You said, Henry, that you could not realize you had a home in heaven. You do not doubt your Saviour, do you?' asked the chaplain as they pressed on together. Camp's face lighted up inspiringly, all aglow with excitement, expressive in its story of tenderest affection, of true courage, and of firmest faith. It was never more fair or bright or beautiful than in that hour and place of death, as the peerless Christian soldier said, with warmth and earnestness, 'No, no! dear fellow! I do not doubt. I do trust Jesus, fully, wholly.' With another good-bye the two friends parted."

Voices of the Soul Answered in God. By Rev. John Reid. (Robert Carter & Bros., New York.)—There will naturally be some question with men of opposite opinions concerning the value and soundness of the ideas Mr. Reid develops in this book, but there can be no doubt with any one concerning the singular bad taste of printing in a preliminary note the praises bestowed on his work by two eminent divines to whom he had submitted it in manuscript. We are willing to believe that these praises are sincere, and are published with the consent of those who uttered them, but they are so evidently the expression of feeling not originally intended for publicity, that the note containing them reads like a violation of confidence, and forms for Mr. Reid a self-puff which prejudices the reader against him from the beginning. One instinctively resents the attempt to spring upon him a conviction of the book's excellence before he has read a line of its author, and comes to doubt the quality of the untasted wine over which so much bush is so vain-gloriously flourished. But in spite of the weakness of this heraldic vaunt, it is a very admirable work, and the author reasons well of the nature of man in sin, and the demand of the human soul for divine pity, forgiveness, and repose. It is not a new thing to prove that humanity is not sufficient to itself in its highest needs; that men neither reform nor save themselves; yet this writer treats his theme with so much life and vigilance that he does not fail to awake in his reader the eternal interest which inspires all thinkers. His style is clear and pleasing, and his manner one in which nothing but the purpose of serving truth is visible. Even his errors, therefore, are respectable; and in a work almost necessarily axiomatic, occasional lapses from a logical train of thought into mere commonplace sententiousness may be pardoned. The introductory parts of the work, in which the author reasons of the nature of man, abound in the most careful observations of the principles and feelings which actuate him in evil; and the section devoted to study of the working of guilt is a most subtle and penetrative analysis of the subject. In many respects Mr. Reid's manner must remind the reader of the eminently simple and transparent manner of Robertson, the young English divine; but Mr. Reid lacks a certain affectionateness of appeal always present in the logical processes of Robertson.

It will have been inferred that Mr. Reid is of the evangelical school of theology. Theodore Parker is his antithesis, but not his bugbear; he cares rather to build his own system than to destroy another's, and he makes sparing use of the worn-out terrors, though we noted in his book one weak allusion to the torments of the death-bed of the wicked. The theologians are learning at last that men are to be touched by rebuke of their own ordinary bad qualities, and not by the spectacle of the sufferings of extraordinary sinners.

The Apple of Life. By Owen Meredith. (Boston: Ticknor & Fields.)—The Angel of the Lord came to King Solomon with an apple plucked from a tree in Eden that the king might eat it and live for ever; but Solomon, considering that he was old, and that an eternal old age would not be a blessing but a curse, carried it to his beautiful young wife, who, in her turn, considering that life without love was nothing, even if youth and beauty could last for ever, gave the apple to Azariah, the king's captain, her paramour. The honest soldier, who was troubled with the danger of loving a queen, did not care to be perpetuated in peril, but to live his little time jollily and recklessly, and so carried it to the Egyptian courtesan; and she, reflecting that an eternity of shame and dishonor was not to be courted, and that everlasting life could only be dear to a king, returned the apple to Solomon. When the wrathful king rent his garment, and demanded of the Egyptian who gave her the apple, he was aware that the Angel of the Lord again stood beside him, and he gave back contentedly the Apple of Life into the hand of Death.

The lesson is plain. The story reads like one from the Talmud, and it is told by Mr. Robert Bulwer Lytton in a poem, which the reader shall vainly read for news. The poem is admirable in its way; but as the father in prose, so the son in poetry; talent does its utmost, but fails of the last, fine success, being wholly unaided by genius. Old ideas tricked out anew; old feelings rouged up afresh; felicities filched from one poet; arts learned from another—the "Apple of Life" is but a Dead-Sea fruit, after all.

Home Heroes, Saints, and Martyrs. By T. S. Arthur. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.)—As literature, Mr. Arthur's writings are scarcely worth consideration. His style is lifeless, the plots of his stories uninteresting, his abundant dialogue is flat, insipid, and undramatic to a surprising degree. His ideas are commonplace, and he is absolutely without artistic effect. In one of the tales in the present collection, for example, he mars the pathos of a scene of sickness by carefully describing the symptoms of the disorder. His heroine is a seamstress, suffering from pneumonia, and in referring to her he politely speaks of her as Miss Carson. Nothing, in fine, could be worse than Mr. Arthur's literature, and nothing better than his sentiment. Regarded as homilies, his domestic stories are blameless, and, we dare say, do a great deal of good in cases which other preaching would not reach. We find it rather curious that an author of this sort should be able to beguile us into reading stupid little fictions of which we know the end from the beginning; that he should be able to move our sympathies by the stalest and shallowest tricks imaginable; and we are half ashamed to confess that we have read a great part of his book. We conclude that a writer of indifferent merit need but be in earnest in order to appeal successfully to the sympathies of readers, but do not on this account desire him to continue writing. He had better be in earnest outside of literature, which, after all, has some right to be considered as an end as well as a means.

THE RIGHETTI HERCULES.

It is not often that the summer quiet of Rome is broken in upon by such a bit of news as stirred in the Eternal City one day in August, 1864. Some workmen digging to strengthen the foundations of the Palazzo Pio (now belonging to Car. Righetti) had struck upon the hand of a colossal statue and, digging a little further, found evidence which persuaded them that the entire statue lay beyond.

It might have been a statue of Proteus, for the manifold story they told—one saying it was bronze, another Corinthian brass, another gold, then bronze again of Roman mixture; now a statue of Domitian, then of Commodus, Pompey, any emperor, and then Hercules. In the want of other matter of interest all the city talked of it and disputed about it.

Whatever it might be, there it lay flat on its back, thirty feet below the street level, one hand groping out into open air, as if to beg a lift into the sunlight and the sight of man after its ages of darkness and oblivion. Further digging determined it to be a Hercules, as all the world knows, though there are two opinions still among artists as to whether it is a portrait of an emperor en Hercule or a purely ideal work; and as the interpretations thinned out, the discussions were more energetic, the singular circumstances accompanying the interment adding not a little to the puzzling character it assumed. Laid in a water-drain, on its back, its limbs protected by pieces of marble guttered out to cover them the better, filled around with fragments of sculpture, architectural ornaments and statuary, and all protected by carefully chosen and laid slabs of travertine, forming a built-up sarcophagus, it had evidently been an object of tender care. Six feet above it was a massive pavement of Porta Santa marble in blocks of about eighteen inches square. Over that the débris of unknown ages of ruin and rebuilding had accumulated their protection to the secret, betrayed at last by the happiest accident for art which the century has met with.

The first of October it was raised from its ancient bed and laid in a room on the ground floor of the Palazzo Pio, whence it was to find its way to the Vatican. A jury of St. Luke's Academy, composed of thirty-six artists and archæologists, met to determine what it was and what might be its absolute as well as comparative value. The large majority of them gave as their verdict that it was a fine work of a fine epoch of Greek art—the minority that it was one of the finest works of the finest period, and we are inclined to respect the opinion of the majority in this exceptional case. All agreed that it was a young Hercules, and that he had been represented holding the apples of the Hesperides.

That it is of a period of art subsequent to the highest development is to us evident, and we have little doubt but that the ultimate judgment of the world will confirm that of the jury. Short of the consummate art, the Phidian, it certainly is not so purely ideal as the Apollo Belvidere, not to be compared in repose and majesty with the Elgin marbles, or in action and finish with the Torso of Apollodorus or the Combattant of the Louvre. The art of it seems to us (always reserving a right to change our judgment on seeing it on its pedestal) carried a little beyond the proper balance with nature—a little into the conventional and exaggerated, and away from the perfect simplicity which marks the best art. Greek it certainly is, and of the ripe if not over-ripe development of the great school; full of masterly execution and resource, and admirable in the knowledge and fidelity of its anatomy without being theatrical or ostentatious. One remarks the ordinary immense development of the lumbar muscles, which seem, however, a little puffy, wanting in muscular solidity, perhaps,—the head of the athlete with the prominent ridge of the brow, retreating and insignificant forehead; the head evidently small, though exactly how small we cannot say, owing to the loss of the whole coronal region, which had apparently been cast separate, leaving the aperture for the extraction of the core * at the top of the cranium, a wreath of laurel having concealed the junction, of which the traces are evident. The manner in which the ball of the eye is rendered is a capital example of masterly conventionalism—a single turn of a scroll terminating in a drill-hole for the pupil, and done like Giotto's O, tells the whole. The modelling of the ridge of the brow, and of the forehead itself, giving the central portion of the ridge the prominence, is vigorously expressive; and the muscle markings generally are admirable. The surface markings of veins, finishing of nails, etc., are most complete and anatomically correct, and the just springing beard, coming only half-way down the cheeks, is cut in intaglio in the metal instead of having been raised in the casting. The lion's skin was made separate, and we are inclined to think was not intended for the position it was ultimately given, not so much from the fact that the arm under it is finished to the same degree of delicacy as the other parts, and gilded, but because the arrangements for holding it seem to be slight and not contemplated in the casting: a rude hole is punched into the arm, indenting it considerably around, and it seems to us after the gilding was done. There is a small statue of Hercules in the British Museum, nearly or quite the same in action, but in which the skin is behind the statue and separate from it, but our recollection of that work is not distinct enough to say if it is a copy of the Righetti statue or no, though it is so pronounced by an artist friend who is perfectly familiar with both of them.

The attitude cannot be determined with absolute certainty—at any rate until it is raised—owing to the want of the left foot; but it seems to us that Visconti, and, in fact, most of those who have given their opinion on it, err in supposing it to have been in an attitude of repose. From careful examination we are inclined to believe that the god was represented in motion, resting his weight on his right foot as he lifts the left for a leisurely step (the distance taken in the last being scarcely the length of his foot), and perhaps about pausing. The weight is thrown too much over to the right of the base for repose; and the heel of the left foot is lifted, judging from the leg, the foot resting lightly on the toe and ball. The club was held in the right hand, trailing backward at a considerable angle; and the action of the flexors shows considerable power to be exerted on it, which could only be the case with the club in that position when he was pushing himself forward, using it as a staff rather than leaning on it. Again, it would hardly be that a man in repose would throw his weight on the right leg and foot at the same time; but, if leaning on the club with the right hand, would share the work with the left foot; and in either case the arm holding the club would naturally fall towards the thigh and rest against it, while in this statue it is held off at a considerable distance and in a position which would require a muscular exertion to keep it there if the attitude was one of repose, but which would be perfectly just to a man pushing himself along by a staff as he walked. The action of the glutæus and the muscles of the left leg generally indicate rather a lift of the limb than a pressure on it. The right sartorius and the rotator quadriformis (the latter marked strongly) show a swinging or rolling motion, as if the body were in the act of moving to another base of support, an hypothesis which the position of the head, alert and straight forward, confirms. But the shortness of the step indicates action leisurely beginning or ceasing, and as the bringing of the apples of the Hesperides was considered the closing feat of the twelve labors, we can only suppose that the latter was the intention of the sculptor. In this respect it resembles the Combattant, which also is shown as if in the act of changing position, and actually rendered in mid-motion, but as energetic and rapid as the Hercules is leisurely. It probably, then, represents the hero in the ideal moment of his life, his last work just finished, and before the rust of idleness has attacked his energies.

* Visconti attributes this to a defect in the casting, "common in those days," and an ingenious book has been published in Rome to prove that the statue was one of the oracular ones, and that the head was left open for the priest to speak into, some wind-holes in the chest being made to let the voice out.

The above analysis, if just, would indicate a perfection of art and knowledge of the human figure which would place the statue but little below the greatest in most of the essential qualities of great sculpture; and whatever may be determined about it in minor respects, it must stand as a noble expression of Greek genius—as one of the highest, but, we believe, not the very highest, which remain to us. Yet, considering the size, the perfection of preservation, as well as the admitted excellence, we venture nothing in saying that the century has brought to light no work so valuable, everything being considered.

Of course, the circumstances of its concealment set all the antiquarians at work to determine what is unknown about it, and speculation has exhausted itself. In disinterring it a portion of the substructure of the theatre of Pompey was laid bare, from which it appears to have been hidden under the encinte of the theatre, towards its outer portion, to the right of the spectator facing the scene, and about ten feet below the ancient level. The place of concealment thus led the archæologists to connect the statue with that dedicated by Pompey in the temple erected by him near the Circus Maximus, and spoken of by Pliny as the work of Myron; and some are still of opinion that it is identical with that statue. But it is far from the Circus Maximus to the Campo de Fiori, and there are signs that the statue was dismounted in great haste. It was thrown down from its pedestal, striking on the upper part of the back, and it evidently struck squarely, as a hole is punched through the centre of the back by a stone or other object on which it struck, and the back itself across the shoulders is slightly broken in, while both arms are fractured as if from the shock of striking, the fractures being on the front of the arms, and reaching only a small part of the way round. To have thrown down—thus hastily and without other precaution against injury than that of choosing the safest position for it to strike in—this enormous mass of bronze, and then to have carried it so far, and buried it with such care, would hardly be consistent. It must have stood near to where it was buried, and the fact of its being where it was found ought to be considered presumptive proof that it belonged in some way to the theatre. And is not the work mentioned by Pliny? The travertine which covered it seems to have been a part of the theatre, and the pieces of marbles guttered out to receive the round of the limbs have the appearance of having been cut for some architectural purpose, and selected for this later use on account of their peculiar shape. The known facts that Hercules was the patron deity of Pompey, and that he erected many statues of the best workmanship, render it more than likely that one of the principal statues of his theatre was a Hercules, and that the one in question is such.* We know, too, apart from the probability that among the "artifices" mentioned were many Greeks, that about that period many excellent Greek artists did come to Rome—Pliny mentions several; and we find Greek work continually in Roman portraits, especially on gems, while also Pompey brought many works from Greece to decorate the buildings, as, for example, among others particularly mentioned, the Hercules by Myron. But, besides the reasons above adduced, the statement of Pliny which alludes to that statue,* whether true or not, would scarcely be said with the Righetti Hercules as a text, since, if formalism there be, it is on the side of grace rather than ugliness. Nor does this statue agree in character with the signed Myron in the Vatican.

The left foot lacking, there being no trace of it to be found, as it probably adhered to the pedestal, the presence of the other apparently broken off before the inhumation, as the iron on which it was cast and the masonry core appear to have broken off with the bronze just below the ankle, with the presence of all the other fragments in the pit, show that it was not merely as valuable material that it was secured, as the smaller fragments might have been carried away; while the care taken to preserve it from injury in the ground would be useless to mere bronze, but very natural to a reverenced statue. We should deduce as the probability, from all these facts, that it was concealed from some public enemy, an enemy at the same time of the religion by which the Hercules was cherished. From any pagan enemy there was nothing to be feared for the statues of the gods, since none of the enemies of Rome carried them away, and we must look to the first coming into power in Rome of the Christians as the probable date of its inhumation. The presence of fragments of fine architecture with the statue would indicate previous ruin of the public buildings, while the size of the excavation and the time necessary to make it, even in the greatest haste, would render concealment unlikely if not impossible—an indication of public sympathy with the concealment, and, therefore, of its being performed while the city was threatened from without, and before even the general prevalence of Christianity. Visconti, to whom we are indebted for the collection of authorities, fixes it during the fifth century. Rome was first sacked by the Goths in 409. This would account for the ruinous condition of the theatre, and the fragments in the pit; the next invasion was in 455, by the Vandals under Genseric, who were Arians animated by a fierce hatred of the false gods and their memorials, and as they are reported by Procopius to have even plundered the palace of the emperor of its copper vessels, we may conceive that the statue of Hercules, being so richly gilded as to pass at first sight for gold, was far from safe from their ravages. It seems most unlikely that the hiding of the statue was later than this, and we may safely reckon, then, that it has lain where it was hidden for fourteen centuries, and though, when first discovered, encrusted with a coating of earth and fragments of stone, which required great force to separate them from the metal, and under this a formation of oxide which promised little else than a pitted and corroded surface, showing only the intention of the work, on the cleaning up it proved that the leaf-gilding was preserved for at least five-eighths of the surface, and the modelling is almost as delicate as when finished.

A few words on the terms of sale and the effect of them on future excavations may not be amiss. It is generally known that Roman law forbids the exportation of antique works of art without permission of the Government, which, while avoiding any declaration of a right to seize private property, makes it almost worthless to its owner until the consent to export has been given. But in the case of the work being of very great value, this is never given, and therefore the Vatican gets all the best things at its own terms. In the case of the Hercules there is no doubt that the statue was ridiculously under-estimated or that either of the principal governments of Europe would have given double the maximum price named by the jury—little more than £10,000. But such a price being beyond the means of the Roman Government to pay, it is evident that the owner is directly defrauded of a portion of the value of his property by being obliged to sell it for the low price it could give, and this through a regulation which has all the sanction of legality. The Government does not claim any ownership in it beyond a sort of waif-tax, since the title may be transferred to any one in Rome, but it will not be allowed to leave the city at any terms, no matter by whom it is purchased. It may be good local policy to retain all great works in Rome; but what kind of justice is it, and what must be the effect of such a policy on exploration if not to discourage it by the uncertainty of adequate reward even when successful? If to-day the Roman Government pays half the trade-price, to-morrow it may pay only a quarter, but will have the same policy of forbidding the exportation of art treasure-trove. When we consider the number of valuable works already found and the probable unexplored quarries, does it not seem a wiser policy to offer every inducement for excavation? Will not the owners of property in which works of art are supposed to be hidden wait for a more liberal régime before adventuring? It is not long since a gentleman resident in Rome, presenting a picture to the National Gallery, was absolutely refused permission to send it away! What, under such circumstances, are works of art but dead property? and who will venture into investments on the chance of reward by the Roman Government?

MUSIC.

THE FIRST CONCERTS OF THE BROOKLYN AND NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC SOCIETIES.

THE Brooklyn society gave their first concert of the season on Saturday evening, Oct. 28. The orchestral works presented were the symphony in B flat major, No. 4, of Beethoven, the overture, "Prometheus," by Bargiel, and the grand polonaise from the music for "Struensee," by Meyerbeer. The solo performers were Bellini, Miss Kellogg, and Mr. Mills.

The fourth symphony of Beethoven, often as it has been played here, was never rendered so well as on this occasion. Mr. Bergmann displayed his own skill as a leader, and brought out the fine qualities of his well-selected orchestra. They played with more intelligence and feeling than ever before. The Brooklyn concerts have for the last year or two been better than those given in New York. It has been the practice there to have but one leader for the season, and the players have been habituated to be guided and led by one man. The New York concerts were led alternately by Mr. Bergmann and Mr. Eisfeld, and the society was divided in its support, and actuated somewhat by personal feelings of regard and jealousy for the two men. The partisans of one did not feel that they could play well under the leadership of the other, and there was not the unanimous spirit which should animate the orchestra so that it should be one vast living instrument. We are glad this state of things has ended, and that it has ended in Mr. Bergmann being made the permanent leader. With much respect for Mr. Eisfeld's knowledge of music, we think Mr. Bergmann far more fitted to conduct an orchestra. He is more careful in study and rehearsal, and feels the music more strongly—at least his sympathy acts through the orchestra much more efficiently on the emotions of the listeners than ever Mr. Eisfeld's did. In one other respect the Brooklyn concerts have been superior. The directors have always taken care to engage some of the best attainable talent for the vocal and instrumental solos. The New York society has thought principally of its dividends, and has relied either upon the voluntary contributions of resident artists, or has engaged inferior singers at a low price.

The fourth symphony was written by Beethoven just after the failure of his opera in the year 1805, or, more probably, in the earlier part of 1806. It was perhaps intended as a statement of the questions then in the composer's mind, and an answer to them. His spirit was then in a cloud: music which he had drawn from his inmost soul had been misunderstood, and had been rejected by the public—who had previously understood and sympathized with him. The symphony begins with an impressive adagio, in slow, deep, measured tones, pierced by a single questioning voice, finding no answer but sighs. The question wanders from the violins to the flute, and back, the flute takes it to its greatest hight, and then all sinks down again into the dull B of the brass instruments, with the string accompaniment with which it began. Then comes the answer, and then a feeling of content and quiet. But from content arises joy and exultation after a short struggle of conflicting feelings. In the minuet, the trio, and the finale, these feelings rise to their height. The symphony is a page from the history of Beethoven's life, showing his progress from gloom and despondency to enjoyment and happiness, in giving himself up again to nature. It does not tell us, as it has to some, a tale of melancholy and successful love. It expresses rather the conflict of the soul with the gloom of distrust and despair.

Bargiel is one of the modern German writers who are little known here. His "Prometheus" overture merely adopts the form of an overture to express certain feelings and ideas regarding that long-suffering, divine man, Prometheus, without being intended as an introduction or a prelude to any drama or other piece. It is a work displaying fine imaginative power and is clearly written. We have promise of hearing it again this winter, as well as a symphony of the same composer, which will introduce us more thoroughly to his merits and characteristics.

The first concert of the New York Philharmonic Society was given on Saturday evening, November 4, to an audience small on account of the rain. The orchestral pieces on the programme were Schumann's symphony, No. 4, Op. 120, in D minor; Liszt's symphonic-poem, "Mazeppa," and Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C. Mr. Mills played as solos Chopin's Etude in C sharp minor, and a Tarentelle by himself, and, with the orchestra, a posthumous concerto in C by Mozart. Lotti was to have sung, but was prevented by illness. His absence, however, was not much to be regretted. The progamme was thus rather meagre in quantity, and only made up for it by the quality of the pieces.

The symphonies of Schumann are all well known here, as they have been given over and over again year after year. The fourth and latest one is not so interesting as some of the others—the one in B flat for instance. It was written just at the close of Schumann's career, and displays some of the last workings of his powerful mind, before it finally gave way. It contains a very beautiful Romanza and Scherzo, but the finest portion is the short, slow movement, and the subsequent triumphant burst of the finale.

The great piece of the evening was the symphonic-poem of Liszt, "Mazeppa." It was suitably placed to be compared with the overture of Beethoven, whom many ultra-classicists regard as the greatest master of music, and with the symphony of Schumann, whom the same men reluctantly admit to be a great composer, and to follow closely in the path of Beethoven. This is their last bound. Beyond this they can see nothing good. Wagner and Liszt they abhor, in the interest of good music and pure art, as they say. And the great objection they make to the class of works of which "Mazeppa" is one, is with regard to the form.

We would not say that the votaries of this school look to nothing besides form; but they certainly seem to make that a primary consideration, and their first condemnation of the works of the new school rests on the alleged ground of their formlessness.

Now the forms which are so hallowed by the usage of the great composers are, in orchestral music the symphony and the overture, and in piano music the sonata. All these forms are primarily referable to the dance or the march form—some of the earlier sonatas, for instance, are nearly all minuet—and the sonata or the symphony is a mere collection of three or four of these forms. Usually the subject is begun in a quick movement; then a slow intervenes; as a contrast to this a very quick one is introduced, and then the subject is repeated in nearly the first time, but usually in a different key. An overture has generally but two of these movements, and was intended, as its name denotes, for a prelude to an opera or a drama. Now, however, it is used for any subject which is not to be treated at great length as an original piece, without regard to anything following. It is evident that these forms, from their nature and from the manner of alternation of movement and repetition of the subject, are calculated rather to retard than to aid the expression of the ideas of the work. A subject cannot be conceived as one whole and contemplated in its varying relations from the beginning to the end; but it must be cut into bits, and those bits must be arbitrarily arranged. It follows that subjects that will not admit of this Procrustean treatment cannot be musically developed, if the old rules and forms are clung to. These forms were not at once originated, but were developed out of what was already existing; they were not voluntary shackles which great composers made for themselves, but which they found already upon them, and which some men of the highest order so wore as not to be seen, and almost succeeded in overcoming all the difficulties produced by them. As the composers of the transition period emancipated themselves from the old forms which were without life, the composers of whom Liszt is a type wish to free themselves from the binding forms left by Mozart and Beethoven, and introduce a more complete development of a poetic definite subject. Such a subject is again a cause of complaint. "Programme-music" they cry out against, music of which we have to have a written explanation to comprehend it. Music is indeed a language of the emotions, but emotions can be definite, and it surely is as well to have some certain subject to cause them. The poet tries to sing his feelings by words which appeal to the head, and thence to the heart; the musician tries to express them by sounds which appeal to the heart more directly. This is what Liszt does in "Mazeppa," and the name which he has chosen of symphonic-poem is as expressive of his intentions as the form is of his ideas.

"Mazeppa" is one of the series of twelve which were published in 1856 by Breitkopf and Härtel, and which were at once the subject of much adverse criticism. Two of them, "Tasso" and "Les Preludes" have been given before. The remaining nine, one of which is "Hamlet," have never been heard here, though most are better works than this, which is an enlargement of a piano study. The theme of "Mazeppa" is not the poem of Byron, but the ode of Victor Hugo in "Les Orientales." The piece commences with the third stanza:

"Un cri part, et soudain voilà que par la plaine
Et l'homme et le cheval, emportés, hors d'haleine,
Sur les sables mouvants,
Seuls, emplissant de bruit un tourbillon de poudre,
Pareil au noir nuage où serpente la foudre,
Volent avec les vents!"

This cry is finely rendered by the cymbals, with which horse and rider start on their rapid course; through valleys and over mountains they go; they are but a speck in the desert sands, they fly through the woods, which crash and echo behind them; they cross swollen streams, they fall in with troops of wild horses through which they madly rush. At last the sun goes down, the birds of prey gather in flocks, night comes, the weary horse falls, and the rider lies swooning on the ground to awake and find himself king. Such is the story of Mazeppa, which is here made symbolical of man carried away by genius.

"Il crie épouvanté, tu poursuis implacable.
Pâle, épuisé, béant, sous ton vol qui l'accable
Il ploie avec effroi;
Chaque pas que tu fais semble creuser sa tombe;
Enfin le terme arrive . . . . il court, il vole, il tombe.
Et se relève roi!"

The work is one of great power, and is a remarkable piece of instrumentation. The burden of the subject is chiefly carried out by the wind instruments and the bassos, the violins and other strings having little to do but to fill in their coloring. It was well and carefully played, with the exception that the harp was left out entirely, for reasons best known to the pockets of the members.

The overture to "Leonore" was the third one written for that opera. The first had depicted the mild gentle image of Leonora; in the second or the third, which is a mere enlargement of it, Beethoven was further in feeling from his opera. His ideas of Leonora are changed. He now regards her as a heroine, and the overture is written in a triumphant tone which would speak almost of Joan of Arc, but which badly falls in with the aria of Marcellina and the duet with which the first act opens. It is a beautiful symphonic work, but no overture which introduces us to the opera. In it are introduced the air of Florestan, the trumpet signal, which called forth such derision from the contemporary Vienna critics, and the air of deliverance which immediately follows it. This air is wanting in the second overture. This anticipation of the opera, which subsequently has become so common, is bad in an introduction, however well it might do in an epilogue. The trumpet signal, for instance, is quite meaningless. We have only space more to allude to the concerto of Mozart, which was beautifully played with Mr. Mills's clear and always correct touch.

JOMINI'S LIFE OF THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON I.

MILITARY AND POLITICAL LIFE OF THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON.

By Baron Jomini,

General-in-Chief and Aide-de-Camp to the Emperor of Russia. Translated from the French, with notes, by

H. W. HALLECK, LL.D.,

Major-General U. S. Army. 4 volumes royal octavo.

WITH AN ATLAS OF 60 MAPS AND PLANS.

Cloth, $25 00; Half Calf or Morocco, $35 00; Half Russia, $37 50.

"The Atlas attached to this version of Jomini's 'Napoleon' adds very materially to its value. It contains sixty maps illustrative of Napoleon's extraordinary military career, beginning with the immortal Italian campaigns of 1796, and closing with the decisive campaign of Flanders, in 1815, the last map showing the battle of Wavre. These maps take the reader to Italy, Egypt, Palestine, Germany, Moravia, Russia, Spain, Portugal, and Flanders, and their number and variety, and the vast and various theatres of action which they indicate, testify to the immense extent of Napoleon's operations and to the gigantic character of his power. They are admirably prepared, being as remarkable for the beauty of their execution as for their strict fidelity as illustrations of some of the greatest deeds in the annals of human warfare. They are worthy of the work to which they belong, which has been most excellently presented, typographically, and deserving of the place which it has taken in Mr. Van Nostrand's noble and extensive library of military publications."—Boston Daily Advertiser.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

A FIRST CLASS PAPER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS,

Published Monthly, in Chicago, Ill., 138 Lake Street,

By ALFRED L. SEWELL.

THE LITTLE CORPORAL contains sixteen pages of first class literary matter. It is intended that it shall contain better original Stories, Poems, and other reading for children, and more matter for the price, than any other children's paper on the continent. First No. published July, 1865.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Though the paper itself is more than worth the price, yet for the sake of offering such an inducement as will ensure beyond all doubt a very large list of subscribers to start with, I have determined to give the following beautiful present to every subscriber for one year:

A Superb Quarto Steel Engraving,

THE CHILDREN'S PORTRAIT OF MR. LINCOLN,

Size, 9⅛ x 11¾ inches, engraved in the highest style of the art, expressly as a premium plate for this paper.

☞ SPECIMEN COPY OF THE PAPER SENT ON RECEIPT OF TEN CENTS.

Address ALFRED L. SEWELL,
Care of Dunlop, Sewell & Spalding,
CHICAGO, ILL.

PREMIUMS TO CLUBS.

Every person who shall send six subscribers, and six dollars, will receive as a premium one extra copy for one year, and also a copy of the above Engraving.

Other inducements advertised in the paper for larger clubs.

READ WHAT THE PAPERS SAY:

The Pittsburg Christian Advocate says: "The best paper for children, published in this great country of ours, is The Little Corporal. It is a gem in the catalogue of monthlies."

Forney's Philadelphia Daily Press says of it: "Judging from the appearance of the two numbers before us, The Little Corporal is destined to become the great children's paper of America."

"A NEW CHILD'S PAPER.—We have received two copies of The Little Corporal. Judging from these specimens, it is the cleverest thing of its kind yet realized in America. Its whole appearance is in capital taste, and there is evidence in it that its editor has rare tact in catering for the wants of the little ones."—Roxbury [Mass.] Journal.

"Certainly, we have seen nothing in the shape of a child's paper which could compare with this, which comes to us from over the prairies."—Portland [Maine] Daily Press.

"We cannot say too much in favor of this beautiful paper."—Bryan [O.] Union Press.

"It already excels every children's paper we know of in this country."—Chicago Evening Journal.

"The children will be better and happier from reading it."—Henry [Ill.] Courier.

"Indeed, there is no paper of the kind published that approaches it as a juvenile journal."—Poughkeepsie Daily Press.

We might quote hundreds similar to the above, but these will suffice now.

TO CLERGYMEN THROUGHOUT THE UNITED STATES:

As editor of THE LITTLE CORPORAL, I hope to induce Ministers to favor the circulation of my paper among their children as a means of doing them good; and I ask each one to send me the name of some intelligent and respectable lady (for whose integrity he can vouch), who will be willing to energetically canvass her own neighborhood for subscribers to THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

Any Minister addressing me, as shown above, will receive by next mail Circulars, showing the opinions of the Press, and will also be informed in relation to the percentage allowed to canvassers; and may also obtain the paper for his own family at half price.

Address as above stated.

THE LIFE OF

MICHAEL ANGELO.

BY HERMAN GRIMM.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN BY FANNY ELIZABETH BUNNETT.

Two Vols. Crown 8vo, $5 00.

"We can most accurately characterize it as a history of painting, sculpture, and architecture in Italy in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries—great times, in which Titian and Giorgione, Michael Angelo and Raphael, were rivals. The book also treats of Angelo as a poet; and is particularly rich in his correspondence, much of it not previously published. Each volume is enriched with an appendix, into which the translator has gathered a variety of notes, explanations, corrections, and illustrations."—Philadelphia Press.

It is throughout a faithful piece of literary labor, into which the author has put his entire heart. The subject is evidently congenial to his taste, and he has wrought upon it with that unflagging zeal which genuine interest alone can give. He is nowhere careless, nowhere superficial: when we have laid down his book, we have the assurance that we know everything about the life and labors of Michael Angelo that the most patient research, the most careful and conscientious investigation, can find for us. And we have rarely had occasion to differ with Grimm in his estimate of Michael Angelo as an artist: at least our difference has never been in kind, but only in degree. We do not consider that he has, on the whole, overvalued or overpraised his subject. And his speculations on art, if not always sound, if sometimes a little strained, are always ingenious and the result of reflection. His remarks at the close of the work on the great and growing importance of literature as compared with art, and the causes of it, are original and striking.

"And our author has a proper comprehension, and gives his readers a proper impression, of the moral greatness of Michael Angelo, and it is from this source that no small portion of his fame and influence is derived. For his character was equal to his genius. One of the greatest of artists, he was also one of the greatest of men. There was that in his life which was higher than the highest of his works. A painter, a sculptor, an architect, and a poet, he was as a man singularly free from the defects and infirmities to which the temperament of the artist is exposed. He was rigidly abstemious in his habits, of strict purity in his relations with women, wholly indifferent to money, of lofty independence of character, and with an insatiable love of labor. The biography of such a man, so amply and copiously told, has a moral value independently of its worth as a contribution to the history of art. All men are not qualified to judge of Michael Angelo's merits as an artist, even if they had the opportunity to study his works, but all can comprehend the moral grandeur of his life, and to feel this we have only to read the work before us."—Boston Advertiser.

PIONEERS OF FRANCE IN THE NEW WORLD.

BY FRANCIS PARKMAN,

Author of "The Conspiracy of Pontiac."

Crown 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

"A narrative which has all the animation, variety, and interest of a romance, and to most readers it will be as fresh and novel as a pure creation of the imaginative faculty. . . The leading, the indispensable merit of thoroughness of research and faithful investigation of all sources of information—that excellence without which, at this day, no felicity of style can secure for an historical work any permanent place in public regard—this volume possesses in the largest measure."—The World.

"Mr. Parkman is already known to fame as one of the most accomplished writers who have made the early history of their country the subject of deep and continued study, assembling for its illustration all the sources that the private relations of discoverers and travellers or that the archives of the parent states in Europe can supply. Mr. Parkman's book is an indispensable supplement and companion to all the existing histories of the United States."—New York Times.

"Mr. Parkman has that prime merit of an historian, the conscientious study and comparison of original documents. He has that hearty enthusiasm which gives warmth and life alike to subject and reader, making his books wholesome reading for both old and young."—North American Review.

Science.

THE meeting of the British Association for 1865 was commenced Sept. 6, at Birmingham, and was attended by an unprecedented number of members, including many of the distinguished geographers and travellers of different countries of Europe. Mr. J. Phillips presided. The first day was occupied by the ceremonies of opening the Central Free Library of the city, after a breakfast at the Mayor's of above two hundred savans. Mr. E. Youmans and party were present from the United States. The president, in his address, spoke of Birmingham as the place where Priestley analyzed the air and Watt obtained the mastery over steam, and of the society as uniting fresh discoveries and new inventions with the solid and venerable truths treasured and taught in academic halls and colleges.

The meetings of the sections commenced the second day. In section F, "Economic Science," Lord Stanley presided. He remarked: "Of the large class of human evils which are reparable as well as preventible, there are few to which the principle of insurance may not be applied. Insurance is the opposite of gambling. The gambler, desiring to gain something which is not his, risks something of what he actually possesses. The insurer, seeking to preserve what he has, submits to a certain small fixed deduction, and so prevents a much larger possible loss. And whatever creates a sense of security is an element of human progress. In this light he looked upon insurance." The president thinks the decimal system of weights and measures desirable, but not likely to be soon adopted. He wished the Board of Trade would assimilate the form of census to that of other European governments. Europe inclines more and more to become one community in thought and action.

"Mechanical Science," Sir G. Armstrong presiding. Mr. Thomas Levick read a paper on machinery for compressing air, and the application of it to coal-cutting and other underground work. The air is conveyed to the machinery underground in four-inch cast-iron pipes, along the main headings, and thence in 1¼ inch gas-piping by india-rubber hose. The engine moves a pick which digs the coal. The pick may be worked at any angle, and on the upper, middle, lower, or any other part of the coal bed, by shifting it on the axis where it is keyed. A hand-wheel moves the machine forward by bevel wheels acting on the machine wheels. A self-acting valve obviates many difficulties, and the steadying arrangement counteracts vibration caused by the blows. The machine has been applied to coal and Bath stone.

It prevents the exposure of life, and will perform a man's day's work in an hour.

The president of Section A, "Mathematics and Physical Science," said that it is now established that the spots on the sun are at a lower level than the penumbræ, and the faculæ at a higher; the photosphere or luminous surface is gaseous, and the spots appear and disappear according to the position of Venus. The central mass of the sun is less brilliant than the photosphere, but whether it is solid or not is not known. Of Mars it seems certain that the redder part is land, the greyer part sea, and snow is visible in the polar regions. The temperatures of the latitudes are believed to be nearly those of the earth, the dense atmosphere retaining much heat. The number of known minor planets is increasing. Luminous meteors and shooting-stars are now within the range of law and observation. The orbits of comets are generally parabolical or hyperbolical. They do not belong to our system. Many of the unresolved nebulæ appear to be gaseous. Professor Tyndall has separated the rays of light from those of heat, so as to produce fire in a dark focus. Numerous improvements have been made in eye-glasses, and a very thin kind of glass has been manufactured. In geometry and algebra new schools have arisen in a few years tending to separate the two. Gutta-percha is inferior to india-rubber for insulating telegraphic conductors at ordinary pressures, but may be superior under great pressure or under deep water. It is believed that the Atlantic cable failed only through a mechanical accident. M. Claudet exhibited photographic pictures, through two lenses, which appeared to be in motion, from the known principle that the retina of the eye retains an image for a short time.

The Chemical section had several interesting subjects submitted to them by their chairman, Dr. Miller. Birmingham is the place where Priestley laid the foundation of modern chemistry by the discovery of oxygen, on the 1st of August, 1744. The first experiment in lighting with gas was made at Soho, by Murdoch. In Birmingham, Dr. Roebuck, a century ago, erected the first leaden chamber for making sulphuric acid, now the most important chemical manufacture of Great Britain. The need of scientific education in schools was urged. The "atomicity of elements" was regarded of fundamental importance among the doctrines of chemistry. Elements are divided, in reference to their atoms, into four classes; but it is a not infrequent phenomenon that two bodies identical in chemical composition have quite different properties. A new nomenclature is needed for newly discovered complex organic acids. Improvements were made last year in preparing magnesium and in separating the newly discovered metals, cœsium, rubidium, thallium, and indium. Deville and Troost have proved that certain metals are permeable by gases at high temperatures.

The Torquay cavern, and the report of its fossil and human remains, afforded the most interesting subject of the Geological section of the association. This cavern, called Kent's Hole, is about a mile east of Torquay harbor, in a small, wooded, limestone hill, and has been known from time immemorial, but was first scientifically examined in September, 1824. Dr. Buckland afterwards prosecuted the investigations. A committee of the society have made systematic excavations, and some of the articles found were on the upper surface, and supposed to be 1,500 or 2,000 years old. Human implements are found with remains of the mammoth, the cave bear, and other animals; no human bones, but pottery, bone implements, stone and metal ornaments, remains of fossils, etc. The excavations are to be continued.

In the section on Zoölogy and Botany, Mr. Jeffreys stated that there are about 520 species of testaceous mollusca (shell-fish) in the British seas, of which 80 are not found in Shetland. Probably as many more are in Shetland and not in the Channel Isles.

In the section on Physiology, Dr. John Davey read a paper on the effects of scanty and deficient food, and said he had never known it to produce disease, and believed occasional fasting beneficial. Scarcity in Lancashire and Ireland does not produce disease; and Welsh cattle are ill-fed, but hearty.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, is pursuing a journey through the South. His letters appear every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

Improvements in Piano-fortes.

One of the simplest and most truly valuable improvements yet made in the Piano-forte is that invented and patented by Mr. David Decker, of the firm of

in this city. By correcting the only imperfections arising from the use of the full iron-plate, and that, too, by not detracting in the slightest degree from its many positive advantages, the Messrs. DECKER have developed in their instruments a tone at once admirable for its purity, fulness, prolongation, and sweetness, and the high estimation in which their improvement is held is well shown in the rapidly increasing business of their firm.—Tribune.

The Week.

THE event of the last week has been the total defeat of the Democrats in all the State and other elections at the North. It has been, on the whole, one of the most crushing defeats any party has ever received, but the World and Albany Argus consider it, as the rebel papers considered the fall of Fort Fisher, a "blessing in disguise."

THUS far the cholera has not spread, and the alarm inspired by the Atalanta cases has subsided somewhat. But something is being done, and we trust the respite given us by the cold weather will be used by the Legislature to pass the Health bill.

WE reprint elsewhere an article from the London Spectator, commenting on the letters of our correspondent at the South. But the writer is mistaken in supposing that this is the first time that correspondence of this kind, giving a simple, unvarnished account of things seen and heard, without much comment, has been attempted in this country. Mr. F. L. Olmsted wrote a series of letters of the same kind to the New York Times, ten years ago, afterwards republished in a volume as the "Seaboard Slave States," in the same spirit, and with the same purpose, and as a piece of "special correspondence" it has, we think, never been equalled in any country both for truthfulness and vividness. The deduction which the Spectator draws from our correspondent's letters as to negro suffrage is not very clear. If it be that the negro is likely to have considerable difficulty in getting the suffrage, or that without it he is likely to be terribly kicked about, we certainly agree with it. If it be that he ought never to get it, we think such a conclusion can only be extracted from our correspondence by regarding defencelessness as a mark of permanent incapacity.

THE article on American cattle which will be found on another page, and those which will follow it on kindred subjects, will be from the pen of perhaps the best authority in this country on this class of subjects.

THE papers contained on Monday morning a long account, coming through that eminently trustworthy source, "a special despatch" from Washington, of the energetic services rendered to the rebellion by the English Consul at Havana, as despatch forwarder and, in fact, general agent. This story, like the list of the Confederate bond-holders in England, ought to be named, as the French papers say, "avec toutes les réserves." The Consul at Havana, like Messrs. Delane, Sampson & Co., doubtless loved the Confederacy dearly, but he loved his place better, and it is not fair to deduce his being a fool from his being a knave. Nobody who considered all the circumstances ever believed that, if the editor of the Times had got part of the Confederate loan, he left it in the power of anybody to blab about it, and we cannot help thinking that, if Mr. Crawford has been forwarding despatches and money for the Confederates, he has kept his own share in the transaction a little too close for our "Washington correspondents" to be able to tell all about it. Why does not some morning paper try the experiment of publishing no despatches, however "interesting," which come from any quarter previously found untrustworthy? We have no doubt that in the long run it would pay, though at first the columns of the paper might be pronounced "heavy."

GENERAL KILPATRICK has been appointed minister to Chili. There is no braver or more deserving officer, or one more utterly unfitted for a diplomatic position. We consider the practice of rewarding either military or political services by appointments to foreign embassies, without any reference to the fitness of the appointee, to be one most potent cause of the dislike and disrepute into which the Government and its cause were found to have fallen during the late struggle. If our relations with foreign powers, or the good opinion of the civilized world, be of any consequence to us whatever, our diplomatists ought to be trained for their work. We have luckily had first-rate men in several of the prominent positions since 1860, but it was more by accident than design. In utter want of diplomatic capacity, it would be difficult to find anybody surpassing General Kilpatrick, unless it be Cassius Clay. The general deserves honor and reward, but not the ministership either in Chili or any other place worth a minister. And what makes the matter worse is, that he goes there at the outbreak of a war in which we shall fill the delicate position of a neutral.

A MAJOR BARNES (Federal) in Mississippi has been making a speech to the negroes in which, it is said, he informed them truly, but perhaps injudiciously, that they "had a right to protect themselves at the click of the pistol and point of the bayonet." This speech is considered "incendiary" by the Jackson News, which openly recommends a resort to Lynch law, in the old style, for the purpose of driving out of the State every Northerner who instigates the blacks to "incendiarism." The editor adds, "We must keep the ex-slave in a position of inferiority. We must pass such laws as will make him feel his inferiority." To force negro suffrage on such doves as these would clearly be an atrocious outrage.

WE believe Mr. Seward is abundantly satisfied with Lord Russell's decision in the Alabama case, as the precedent it establishes will furnish a far more potential means of revenge than war ever could. But it is still very doubtful whether the English public, whatever Lord Russell may say, will be satisfied to let the matter lie as it now is.

A DEMOCRATIC club, intended, we presume, to be an offset to the Union League Club, has been established in this city. It is to be a close corporation—the board of management being armed with full powers, including that of filling up its own vacancies. Clubs ostensibly, and to a certain extent really, formed for social purposes, are evidently destined to play a very influential part in our politics hereafter, as they have done in England. But they will never be a thorough success until they supply more conveniences for less money.

A LARGE number of Baltimore ladies have petitioned the President for Jefferson Davis's pardon. The petition is a curious document, and draws its most prominent argument for mercy, as have other petitions from the South, from Mr. Davis's own sufferings, and those of his wife and family. The "sunniness" of the South is also much relied on in these appeals, as if there would not be much to be said for the poor fellow if he came from a rainy or foggy district.

THE enquiry into the "accident" on board the St. John, in the Hudson River, has ended in the usual way. Like most other human events the catastrophe was due to a combination of causes. Nobody was to blame, but if anybody was to blame, the jury hopes he will be more careful another time.

ANY reader of the World, during the late canvass, might, judging from the amount of space it devoted to the discussion of the question, have fairly concluded that the issue really was whether General Slocum was or was not "a cotton thief." The result of the election has hardly been calculated to satisfy the general with this mode of advocating his claims to office.

A RALEIGH newspaper points out an error in our Southern correspondent's letter (No. 15) concerning the North Carolina Convention. It was said, in explanation of the absence of the Hon. George E. Badger, that he "is now an inmate of the State Lunatic Asylum." He is, on the contrary, at his own residence in Raleigh, and is afflicted, not with insanity, but with partial paralysis. His intellect is untouched. Our correspondent was, of course, misinformed.

ACCORDING to the Washington Republican, Chief-Justice Chase refuses to sit in Richmond for the trial of Jefferson Davis because that district is under martial law, and it would not, he thinks, be proper or becoming to open the civil courts subject to the permission express or implied of the military authorities. This objection, however, seems just as applicable to Washington as Richmond.

IT is rather late to speak of the release of John Mitchel, which was never an event of great import, and has now, no doubt, passed out of a public mind filled with thoughts of cholera. But we think the reasons given by the President for letting Mitchel go are too remarkable to be slighted in any notice of public events. The Fenians, who demanded Mitchel's release, said winningly that while they could never forget that he had risked all a patriot should for Ireland, they remembered nothing of his American career; and Mr. Johnson sweetly responded with a compliment to the delicacy of this observation, adding that he yielded to their prayer as a mark of respect for the large number of Irishmen who sympathized with Mitchel in his rebellion against the English Government rather than in his disloyalty to ours. We like the neatness and naïveté of this, and find it of a piece with the little wisdom by which the world is governed: A man has attempted to cut your throat, but you forgive him at the request of friends who ignore the offence against your own life, but who have a proud remembrance of the assassin's greatness in setting your neighbor's house on fire.

WIRTZ was, it appears by the finding of the court-martial, convicted of "conspiring and confederating" with Jefferson Davis, James A. Seddon, Howell Cobb, and others, to do what he did at Andersonville. Now, when a subordinate "conspires and confederates" with his superior, the superior is certainly the principal in the crime. Davis was President of the Confederate States, and Seddon the Secretary of War, and if they connived even at Wirtz's offence, and yet are sent about their business, we do not see that much of injustice will be done, but certainly Wirtz's case will seem rather a hard one. However, we are bound to say that the evidence in support of Davis's or Seddon's moral complicity with his crime produced so far, has been remarkably scanty, and if there is nothing more conclusive forthcoming, we shall all wish heartily that the Government had not committed tself so fully to the support of the charges against them by its proclamations. We say this on its account, certainly not on theirs. We learn, moreover, that Dr. Lieber's researches in the captured "archives" at Washington have resulted in just nothing. The "archives" are a mass of rubbish, and may be handed over to the paper-makers any day.

MR. EDWARD A. POLLARD, "of Virginia," as it is his sovereign pleasure to subscribe himself, advises the people of the South of his intention "to write a full and complete history of the war of the Confederates in America." His qualifications for this ambitious task are the fact that his "Annals of the War," first published in Richmond, were reprinted in London and New York, and that in his capacity of a rebel editor in the first-named city he was "trained to the best sources of information in the Confederacy"—whatever that may mean. Mr. Pollard's motive is not concealed. He will endeavor to justify Davis's treason, Floyd's thefts, Ruffin's shot at Sumter, Wirtz at Andersonville, Forrest at Fort Pillow, Kennedy among the New York hotels, Blackburn's yellow-fever dispensation, Booth's butchery, and all other acts which the North will employ "to hand the Confederates down to posterity as savages and assassins." In short, he means "to rescue the lost cause of the Confederacy from defamation, and to enlighten and erect again the name of his peculiar country in the eyes of the world." The peculiarity of the country to which he refers, like that of a certain institution which made it notorious, consists, we suppose, in its non-existence.

A CLERGYMAN of St. Louis has been visiting the prisons of that city, and reveals a shocking disregard of health and morals in their present condition. The calaboose is underground, and differs from the stable which it once was only in containing human beings instead of horses. It is dark and noisome, flagged with rough stone, through or over which waste water from the hydrants is constantly passing, and dripping from above with the filthy leakage of neighboring vaults. Each cage is twelve feet square by nine high, and often contains a dozen inmates, only half of whom find refuge from the damp on a rude bench about the sides. Sex is the only distinction made in confining prisoners together. The city work-house, being out of the city, is a less infamous place than the calaboose, but is likewise deficient in ventilation and classification. "The county jail has been regularly reported as a nuisance, once in every two months, by every grand jury for the last ten years." Its prisoners are packed so closely that each one is scarcely allowed more air, not subject to renewal, than if he were kept, says Dr. Eliot, in a hogshead or the box of a grand piano.

WIRTZ has furnished somebody with an account of his life which has been published. From it he appears to have been an exemplary physician of retiring disposition, and afflicted with a conscience too sensitive for this rough and somewhat unscrupulous world. He was entrusted with the charge of prisoners owing to Winder's accidental discovery of his merits. The misfortunes which followed he ascribes partly to bad luck, and partly to the perjury of his enemies, whom he is said to intend to haunt after his death. That mode of revenge has, however, lost all its terrors now-a-days, as people are used to spirits.

IT has been well remarked that our Government securities before the close of the rebellion fluctuated alike in the domestic and foreign markets according to the varying successes of our arms. Now, however, the London and Frankfort quotations are affected by considerations of our national policy, especially where Europe is involved. Thus the Monroe doctrine as applicable to Mexico is a permanent element of disturbance, and a rumor of war with France, no matter how unfounded or unfathered, sends five-twenties down as quickly as a hurricane the barometer. These panics, of which we Americans can generally have no warning whatever, are certainly an inconvenient consequence of foreign confidence in our permanence as a nation.

THERE is a wonderful story afloat of the attempt of Wirtz's wife to furnish him, osculando, with a strychnine pill, frustrated, however, by a vigorous dash at his throat on the part of General Baker.

THERE has been a smart and partially successful attack made on Matamoras by the Liberals, led on, according to one account, by seventy Americans. It was repulsed after two hours' fighting. The "imperial" account of the affair is a model of "imperial" writing. The "outlaws" treacherously surprise the regulars, are momentarily successful, but are speedily routed, and "flee" in the most cowardly manner amidst the execrations of the inhabitants, etc.

THERE is little news from England by this mail. Lord Palmerston has been buried in Westminster Abbey, and Lord Russell, to the ill-concealed disgust of a large body of his supporters, is to be his successor. But the general impression seems to be that he is but a stop-gap, and that, at his age, another change must speedily occur. He is the last of the great Whig statesmen who have, except at short intervals, ruled England ever since 1688.

THE "ultimatum" which the London Times announced as having been sent to France by Mr. Seward, dwindles down in the columns of that same journal to a friendly remonstrance against the despatch of troops to Mexico.

THE reason has been ascertained why the Social Science Congress sat at Sheffield, England, last month. There are social abuses there which need correction, and which have received ventilation—the first step toward correction. Public attention has been roused to the employment of children in the factories and furnaces, and it is found that it is a common thing for them to be put to work at the age of nine, and even eight years, and tasked for ten, twelve, or thirteen hours daily. "One large house in the crinoline trade had a staff of children working night after night, dining at midnight instead of mid-day, where they could; they were turned into the street, and no one had the slightest control over these children while they were away from these works at midnight." Such practices, as the London Times very justly remarks, are "a crime almost amounting to manslaughter."

EVEN the Zoölogical Gardens have been invaded by the cattle plague now ravaging England. Three noble specimens of Italian cattle, the gift of Victor Emmanuel, and two bison, have already perished.

DR. LIVINGSTONE had reached Bombay, intending to make preparations there for his new expedition into Africa, in which he will explore the water-courses of the continent northward from the Zambesi. He expected to set out at the close of last month.

THE King of Würtemberg has issued an order scolding his officers for want of respect. He says they do not salute him with proper concert of movement in the theatre. They should all rise together when he enters. He complains, too, that the guard does not "turn out" for him with the necessary rapidity, and in order that all sentinels may know him when they see him, every guard-house is to be provided with an "exact photograph of him at the expense of the regiment." To prevent mistakes, also, every sentinel is to salute every court carriage, but to be careful not to give a royal salute to any but princes in "the direct line," unless accompanied by princesses in the direct line. When he was a student at the university, attending the lectures of Ranke, the historian, he had a private box constructed for himself and his aide-de-camp, so that he might not be contaminated by contact with the common herd on the benches. But the students, to their honor, would not stand it, and refused to allow the lecturer to be heard till the aristocratic abomination was removed, as it was. Middle-aged Germans are more patient.

WHILE all the doctors in France are pressing forward with specifics for the cholera, M. le Curé d'Elbeuf-en-Bray has thought to turn an honest sou in offering to pious acceptance the image of the Blessed Virgin. M. le Curé says very justly that we are in the cycle of the Immaculate Conception, and begs good Christians to do as their fathers would have done: to pray to the Virgin, and to wear her image on their stomachs. M. le Curé has a church which needs repair, and he has published the offer of the image in question, with a list of tempting advantages in masses, for those who shall contribute something in return. Give and pray, says M. le Curé d'Elbeuf-en-Bray; and the correspondent of the Indépendance Belge likens his reverence to those who made a mart of the temple.

THE loss of her daughter has been so heavy a grief to Madame de Girardin that she has resolved to withdraw from all the familiar objects which could remind her of her bereavement. Consequently, the beautiful new house of M. de Girardin, one of the most elegant in Paris, is to be sold, with all the furniture and works of art now in it.

ONE of the editors of the Constitutionnel has bought the little place called Mont-Louis, to which Rousseau retired after his quarrel with Madame Lépenay. He wrote "Emile" in this house, and his cabinet and table are still preserved there.

ON the 15th of August three hundred tons of coal were floated through the temporary Suez Canal. Still more recently a load of coffees, gums, etc., was also transported by the same means direct from the Red Sea to the Levant.

AT a Parisian theatre, lately, when they were to give a pleasant piece, called "Supplice d'un Homme," the principal actress was seized with illness, and could not appear. Another offered to replace her; but the audience, with a ferocious tint from the drama, cried: "Madame Thierret or death!" The ingenious manager suggested the compromise of returning the spectators' money, which they accepted with enthusiasm.

THEY have lately erected in the village of Monthard, where Buffon was born, a bronze statue of the great naturalist. The statue is by Dumont, of the Institute, and represents Buffon in the costume of the court of Louis XV.

THE attitude which Austria, jointly with Prussia, has assumed toward the minor German States, in the note lately dispatched to the Senate at Frankfort, is one that attracts an attention different from the speculative regard with which we view her experiments with subject nationalities. In this note the two great Powers demanded of the Senate the prevention of certain reunions of the federal deputies, in which sentiments of hostility to Austria and Prussia were expressed, and threatened an armed interference if the Senate refused to obey. According to the latest news, the Senate has refused, very peremptorily, to obey, and it now remains to be seen whether the machinery of the German Confederation, so efficient for mischief, can be made to work for the protection of a weak German Power against the oppressive insolence of two strong German Powers.

A DISCOVERY, most valuable to literature, has been made by a German writer, who has found in the family archives at Baireuth twenty-five authentic letters of Voltaire, addressed to the Margravine of Baireuth. The letters are presently to be published (with a commentary, of course) in Prussia and France. In the latter country the great literary expectation was the new volume of poems by Victor Hugo, to have been published the 23d of October. It is called "The Songs of the Streets and Woods," and is a book, says some prophetic gossipper, of lively and familiar odes, such as streets and woods might sing, and pitched, not to the grave and lofty note of Juvenal or Dante, but rather to that of Horace and Anacreon.

ACCORDING to English correspondence (which is not always to be trusted, as we have reason to know) Russia is treating the Poles with such rigor that it is impossible for them to remain under the government of their conquerors without renouncing country, language, and religion. Catholic churches are destroyed, and parents are fined heavily for baptizing their children in the Latin faith. A fine is also imposed for the possession of Polish books, and the Poles complain bitterly of the removal of their national libraries to St. Petersburg. 300,000 volumes and a magnificent collection of manuscripts were sent from the Zulaski Library, and the business was entrusted to those ardent bibliophiles, the Cossacks, who neatly cut the books to fit the boxes prepared for packing them.

In Russia the first warning (avertissement) under the new law regulating the press has been given to the Gazette de Saint-Pétersbourg, which had published an article denying the Government's right to alienate the public lands, and declaring that these should be held as a guaranty for the redemption of the paper money of the state. The article was thought injurious to the public credit, and the paper was warned: an action which produced a painful impression among those friends of reform who had hoped that a real liberty was to be given the press, and that the avertissement would not be employed. But the very first discussion of a public question has provoked the admonition. Meantime, the Emperor's minister of war is studying a reform of great importance, by which the term of military service shall be virtually reduced from twenty-five to seven years. A certain number of men, who have been seven years in the army, are to be annually dismissed, but to remain at the disposal of the Government for eight years longer, after which they are absolutely discharged.

The cordial relations between Russia and Italy have lately suffered some change, through an indiscretion of the Gazzetta Ufficiale d'Italia. Certain Italians, who had taken part in the Polish revolution, were sent to Siberia, but Prince Gortchakoff informed the Italian envoys that they would receive a pardon from the Emperor. The Gazzetta Ufficiale made haste to acquaint the public with this gratifying intelligence; and now Gortchakoff feigns to see a grave indelicacy in the publication which the Italian Government has permitted, and has informed its ambassador that Russia feels absolved from her promise of clemency toward the Italians in Siberia. The logic is striking, but will scarcely satisfy its victims, we imagine.

As for the removal of the French troops from the States of the Church, it creates in the country bordering on Italy a dismay as great as the satisfaction it gives in the capital. In Rome it is not desirable to have a strong military force, but in the provinces the condition of the people, abandoned to brigandage, with only the slender protection of the Papal troops, will be pitiable. It is well known how the brigands have constantly retreated from the Italian soldiers into the territories of the Pope, where they have always found succor and encouragement. But now Italy intends to strengthen all her posts on the border, so as to make incursions into the kingdom impossible, and it seems likely that brigandage will be forced to prey upon the dominions of the Church, which has so long and tenderly fostered it. Some detachments of Papal troops have been moved toward the frontier, but no confidence is felt in them, and the wealthier inhabitants of the border are deserting their country-seats.

One of the plans proposed for the destruction of brigandage in Naples is immigration—population of the infected districts with overwhelming numbers of honest and diligent colonists from other parts of Italy. Would it not be curious if this scheme should take effect through the existence of petroleum in hills that have heretofore teemed only with banditti? A Lombard chemist professes to have found a quality of the famous oil, superior even to our own, in the Abruzzi, and we shall no doubt hear soon of countless stock companies in Milan for working the new source of wealth and civilization. In the meantime, we commend to the Italians who shall go to the Abruzzi to seek the "subiti guadagni," and build the sudden cities of their oil regions, a translation of the graceful nomenclature of our oil regions. Villa di Tito, Cittadolio, Buca del Pozzo, would be pleasant and musical names for the future towns of the oil-bearing Abruzzi.

While a Lombard chemist has made this discovery in Naples, some one has found out the swindle of a statue of St. Mary Magdalena in Milan. This effigy wept when infidels and heretics came into its presence, and had a pious popularity. It was made of terra cotta, and was filled with water, which, being heated below, produced the steam that fell in affecting drops from the eyes of the saint. One thinks with horror of the chance of once heating the water too much, and of causing the saint to explode like a boiler.

But these wicked and shameful shams are growing to be obsolete in Italy, and in a little time it will be difficult to find there a winking Madonna or a crying Bambino. The evacuation of the monasteries has already begun, and early in October one of the oldest of these passed into the possession of the secular authorities. It is that of San-Domenico Maggiore at Naples, in which St. Thomas Aquinas lived and lectured in 1272, and the crucifix is still there which addressed the saint: "Thou hast written well of me, Thomas; what reward hast thou received therefor?" provoking the response, "Nothing but thee, Lord." The Indépendance Belge, which reports the evacuation of the monastery, says that the crucifix was quite mute in the presence of the municipal officers, and did not pronounce the smallest anathema against our perverse age.

Italy is about to send a frigate to Japan as a preliminary to commercial relations with that empire. That which interests us more is the fact, now fixed, that she is to send Ristori to us next autumn, with an Italian company. The contract with the impresario Grau has been made, and we may look for the famous actress in October, 1866.

At the Central Park on Wednesday of last week a middle-aged member of the medical profession, with a taste for geology and notoriety, was good enough to entertain the idle vulgarity of this city with a spectacle of which it is curious to read. It is not, perhaps, strange that a widower of mature years, and the father of a family of grown sons and daughters, should wish to marry a young lady of beauty and accomplishments; but we find it rather odd, even in America, where we are accustomed to baby-shows, that he should wish to make a public exhibition of his happiness, should suffer the proposed amusement to be heralded in the newspapers, and should on a certain day furnish sport to the multitude assembled to see his bridal party go up in a balloon. A bridal car had long been in a state of gorgeous preparation, and on the day of the ascent Professor Lowe's well-known amphitheatre was decked with garlands of evergreen and flowers; a floral arch spanned the pathway leading to the balloon, and young maidens, habited in robes of white and silver, strewed blossoms under the feet of the advancing pair, of whom the reporters give elaborate biographies. When the party entered the bridal car, however, it was found that the balloon had not strength enough to float so much folly, and the number of excursionists was reduced to four. Then the balloon went up, and at a certain altitude the bride and groom signed a matrimonial compact, as creditable to our literature as their whole proceeding is to our society:

"Sacred compact of holy matrimony, solemnized above the clouds, floating in mid air, and in accordance with the laws of the Empire State, this 8th day of November, A.D. 1865.

"Presenting ourselves fully impressed with the sublime presence of God and the joyous spiritual beings of his creation, heartily approving heaven's highest vouchsafed happiness, the blessed union of two souls in purity and glowing love emanating from the eternal fountain of truth and wisdom, hence deriving some primitive conception of the magnitude of Deity inspired unceasing humanity, and endowed with powers and attributes evermore approximating divinity, with assurances that uninterrupted progress remains dependent upon genial social relations, and possessing the approving sanction of cherished friends—

"We, the contracting parties, John F. Boynton, M.D., of Syracuse, N. Y., and Mary West Jenkins, of St. Louis, Mo., do now, henceforth evermore, give and devote ourselves, each unto the other, in holy wedlock, and we solemnly and unreservedly avow and promise that we will love, honor, and cherish each other as husband and wife during our whole existence, and, in the expressive language of Holy Writ, we hopefully pray—'Whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder.'"

As the clergyman who united these two people in marriage at their hotel denies any complicity with their desire for notoriety, we indulge the belief that the language of the ceremonial, hardly less remarkable than that of this compact, was also an emanation from the bridegroom's brain. The newspapers give it, with the prayer, in full; and abound, of course, in minute and impudent descriptions of the dresses and looks of the whole bridal party. Indeed, the occasion offered rare scope to the peculiar powers of New York reporting, and the accomplished gentlemen of the press have indulged in every luxury of witless invention and brutal drollery concerning it.

It is certainly possible that the subjects of this notoriety did not seek it all, though they provoked it, and the celebrity they have achieved may be owing in part to the ingenious management of Prof. Lowe, whom we compliment on having achieved the standing of master-mountebank. The exhibition had the charm of novelty, and yet we hope it was not altogether pleasant to the hero and heroine. We trust that, under the leering regard of all those spectators, the bridegroom felt a little honest shame, and repented of challenging for his wife the sort of jest and comment which must have passed round the crowd. Nay, since Dr. Boynton makes his family affairs so public, may we beg to know what his son and his daughters thought at the time of the father's bridal tour in a balloon? We wonder if the bride will care to preserve for her children's gratification the history of her exploit, so gracefully given in the daily papers?

Marriage was once supposed to have some claim to dignity and decency in its celebration; but if it has not, if it is merely part of a public show, why should not the next bridal party go down in a diving-bell or be passed through a pneumatic tube?

A PAUSE in the succession of the crimes which were of almost daily event in the earlier autumn gives a vivid and painful interest to the horror recently reported from Hartford. There an old citizen, who had held trusts of great importance, and was valued for many public and private virtues, yielding to an impulse of insanity, cut his wife's throat, and then made an attempt upon his own life. The deed has nothing of the guilt of murder; yet there is something so appalling in all its circumstances as to give it the cruel fascination belonging to the assassinations which De Quincey has celebrated.

It would be hard, indeed, to conceive of a tragedy more terrible than it was: terrible in its bloody dénouement, but infinitely more terrible for the lurking madness that wrought it out. Modern science has taught us to feel due pity for the miserable being on whom insanity steals, and it is known to those who care to read of such matters, that the victim of madness is usually aware of its approach, and maintains a long and secret struggle against its dominion, while to the indifferent regard he seems taciturn and depressed. His own physician may fail to note these symptoms, or may refer them to other causes; and none but those with whom he is in the closest intimacy are able to connect these appearances with other reasons—quite as subtle and intangible—for alarm.

In the case of Mr. Greene, of Hartford, his wife alone seems to have felt anxiety concerning his state. He had lost a daughter, greatly beloved, more than a year ago, and his grief had subsided into a despondent melancholy, in which he was known to say and do things expressive of a hypochondriac fear of poverty. But up to the very evening of the violent possession to which he surrendered himself, it had not been thought that his reason was unsettled.

The history of his lunacy, like the wild purpose of his deed, lies lost in the confusion of his disordered brain; and one can only think with profound compassion of the long strife of the maniac with his besetting demon before he responded to its awful bidding, and of the long fear and agony that must have gone before her death in the victim. She was the madman's wife, and her keen perception had discerned the signals of a presence to which she could oppose nothing but vain hope and a reluctance of belief. On her and on him a burden and bond of concealment rested; and there is now no clue to the anguish which she had doubtless suffered, except her words to those who arrived too late to save her: "My husband has killed me: I was afraid to be alone with him!" a revelation of infinite meaning and pathos. "Oh, you will not find him," she said to those that asked for him, as if the cunning of his insanity had become familiar to her; and in a few moments more, before the madman was found in his room, with wounds inflicted on his own throat, she expired. It seems that she sat reading at the table in the centre of the room, and that the maniac stole behind her, and gave the stroke before she was aware of his presence. A copy of the "Knightly Soldier" lay opened face downwards on the table, as if she had turned the book mechanically over in her terror, and its covers were stained with blood.

So ended the long tacit tragedy, breaking at last into palpable and horrible event. The apparent fatality of the violence paralyzes. It does not seem that it could have been averted by human agency, known as its source was only to its victims, and with this knowledge instinctively hidden by them even from one another. Yet it is strange that science, which, from the prevalence of insanity in our time, has won a subtle and profound comprehension of its character and mysteries, should have been as helpless to prevent a calamity like this as it would have been in days when maniacs were chained and beaten, and their violence was regarded, not as a development of an existing disorder, but as the first symptom of madness. It is admitted that diseases of the brain multiply with frightful rapidity under the stress of our high-pressure civilization, in which man's intellect is goaded to excessive activity by excitements and rivalries; but while medicine makes wise and humane provision for the treatment of the insane, slight regard seems to be given to those cases in which the awful malady has not violently declared itself. There are various reasons for this: the cunning which accompanies insanity prompts its victim to skilful concealment of its symptoms; friends are loath to credit the terrible visitation, and even when they can no longer doubt, are loath to acknowledge it by appeals for aid; physicans cannot always treat melancholy in their patients as incipient madness, and there is no commission before which low-spirited people can be tried for lunacy. But in spite of all this, it seems to us that in a case like that of Mr. Greene, enough was manifest to justify at least a surveillance of his actions, and it is hard to understand how the learning of modern medicine failed of practical effect under circumstances which had attracted the careless notice of mere acquaintance. Here the prompt and frank agency of the physician seemed to be imperatively called for, and due consideration of the invalid's symptoms might have saved a mind from ruin, a human being from death, and a family from desolation.

THE FREEDMEN.

THERE is little to report from the Bureau at Washington. Several of the assistant commissioners, including Gens. Fisk and Swayne, are here at the North, engaged in enlightening the public in regard to the actual condition of the South, and in obtaining succor for the poor of that section. Gen. Howard reached Fernandina, Florida, on the 27th of October, and in the evening addressed the colored people in one of the churches. His speech was marked with simplicity, directness, and sound instruction, and was not inappropriately followed by the singing of "Good News from a Far-off Land"—an original negro melody. Miss Merrick's orphan asylum was also visited by the general. On the 29th he arrived at Tallahassee, and on the 31st set out for Mobile.

—It is said the Louisiana planters have found it profitable to pay their hands according to the amount of cotton picked per diem.

—Gen. E. M. Gregory, the assistant commissioner for Texas, is warmly spoken of as a capable and upright official, whose personal influence on the freedmen is already perceptible. The notion which prevails among them, however, that there will be a general division among them of their masters' lands at Christmas-time, has inspired the white population with genuine fears of an uprising during the holidays. As it is, a collision is even now threatened, which the withdrawal of our troops would be certain to precipitate. Not only an attempt at re-enslavement, but at depriving the freedmen of a portion of their rights, would suffice to bring on hostilities. "This country," writes a correspondent, "appears to me to have more in common with the Empire of Mexico than with the United States."

—A letter from Southern Arkansas ascribes to the white population there a very unenviable character, in which laziness, ignorance, and conceit are combined with a remarkable adaptation for abusing negroes and stealing cotton and horses. The region being sparsely settled, it is impossible for the Bureau to control all parts of it, and slavery is only nominally abolished. The Freedmen's Farm, at Pine Bluff, on the Arkansas River, is prosperous under the charge of Capt. Mallory, who expects to raise at least 500 lbs. of cotton to the acre. The freedmen work well and steadily.

THE DEMOCRATIC COLLAPSE.

THE result of the elections of last week will be, it may be fairly conjectured, to extinguish what there was left of life in the Democratic party. Whatever hopes the managers may have had of prolonging its existence have doubtless died out since the defection of New Jersey. Its defeat in that State is to it what the "collapse" is in cholera, an unmistakable symptom of impending and inevitable dissolution. Until the occurrence of that untoward event, there was hope even from such mustard-plasters as Governor Seymour's speeches, or such tickling of the soles of the feet as Mr. John Van Buren's jokes. But since New Jersey has given way, of course all the doctors have put up their nostrums and gone home, sadder and, we hope, wiser men. There is now little left to be done but to prepare for the decent interment of the old and once powerful and respected organization.

This sorrowful event can, however, hardly be said to have taken anybody by surprise—probably the chiefs less than anybody else. The symptoms of the malady which on Tuesday last terminated fatally showed themselves long ago, and the history of the party for the last ten years has been little better than a study in pathology. Such susceptibility to morbific influences was probably never before witnessed in a political organization. There has hardly a single question come up during the last ten years on which it has not taken ground which the country ultimately not simply repudiated as impolitic or inexpedient, but stigmatized as repugnant to its moral sense.

Not that there is anything very wonderful in party managers taking no note of the moral bearings of the measures they support, but the Democratic leaders have exhibited what they and men of their stamp consider far more discreditable than want of goodness, and that is want of skill in their own calling. The whole art of a successful politician in a free country consists in finding out either what the public is likely to do if left to itself, or what he is likely to be able to persuade it to do, and yet in this art the leaders of the Democratic party, with all their long experience, have shown themselves fatally deficient. We hear a great deal of late of the blunders into which the London Times, the Saturday Review, Lord Russell, and Mr. James Spence fell with regard to the course the American people were likely to take upon the various great questions which have agitated the country during the last four years; but their worst mistakes have, considering that they are foreigners who never set foot in the country, been trifling compared to those committed by the Seymours, Pendletons, Pierces, Vallandighams, and Curtises. We have no hesitation in saying, too, that the worst attacks on our national character which have appeared in foreign journals during the past four years, have not covered half so much really biting insult, so much deep contempt for it, as popped out from almost every step taken by the Democrats in opposition to the Government during the war, or in opposition to the anti-slavery agitation which preceded it. Almost every argument used by them in deprecation of the anti-slavery movement was drawn from the supposed indifference of the people to everything but material interests. To everything that was said, or could be said, of the moral or political evils of the growth of slavery, they had but one reply, and that was that to meddle with it would cause the loss of Southern custom. Whenever, too, they sought to present the possible dissolution of the Union in darkest colors, its probable effect in destroying trade was the consideration which they always put most prominently in the foreground.

In their efforts, also, to put a stop to the war, they relied almost exclusively upon appeals to the very basest and most selfish motives, fear, love of ease, love of money, and local jealousy, and they did so with a confidence which proved what a very low estimate they had of their audience. They did their best to ruin the Government credit by talking of repudiation as a thing sure to happen. They laughed at the notion that the American people would ever be such fools as to pay such a debt, even if they were able to do so. And they were not restrained even by personal pride from soliciting foreign interference, and trying to impress foreign governments with the belief that nothing else could save the country from ruin. When we condemn Louis Napoleon for taking advantage of our perplexity to invade Mexico, it will hardly do to forget what passed between the Democratic leaders and Lord Lyons in this city in the fall of 1862.

The moral of the history of the party is very plain and simple. It teaches, in the most unmistakable manner, that lesson which of all others politicians are apt to be most unwilling to learn, and that is, that nothing succeeds in the long run in America but principle. The plan of governing by arrangements, compromises, fictions, concealments, and so forth, has been tried for ages in Europe, and has there succeeded fairly. Social and political devices based on great wrongs, and setting moral laws at defiance, have, for reasons too numerous to specify here, achieved a considerable degree of success. But the two conditions which more than all others have contributed to their success—popular ignorance and submissiveness, and the force of tradition—are here totally wanting, and the Democratic party has come to grief simply because the leaders refused to recognize this difference. With all their abuse of Europe, and professions of exemption from its influence and from the yoke of its ideas, and loud proclamations of democratic feeling, the Seymours, Vallandighams, and Pendletons are European politicians, and measure the public by the European standard, and argue from European data, and have the European opinion of the popular sagacity and conscience. It has taken them a long while to find out their mistake, but we presume they have found it out.

These recent defeats are but illustrations of the truth that in our politics not only is honesty the best policy, but that it is difficult, if not impossible, for any public man to rate too highly the class of motives by which our public is actuated. In other words, he is pretty sure to come out best in the end who acts as if the people, instead of being selfish, timid, parsimonious, despisers of ideas, or, as it is the fashion to call them, "isms," were chivalrous, open-handed admirers not of what seems likely to pay best, but of what, in their very best moods, they think most nearly right, in the highest sense of the word.

One effect of the result of the elections will undoubtedly be to give greater elucidity to Mr. Johnson's ideas of what the North requires as a settlement. This is all the more important, because we think the events of each day make it clearer and clearer that he means to do right, and that his aberrations from the straight road, whether real or apparent, are due rather to dimness of mental vision than to a love of crooked ways. The dislike of the loyal States to half-way measures might, perhaps, have been revealed more strongly, but still it has been revealed. The vote of last Tuesday was a solemn confirmation, as solemn as could well be uttered, of all that has been uttered and done for truth, and freedom, and justice during the last four years. All that is to be feared now, it is plain, is too great credulity, too great disposition to rely upon professions and fine words, where written contracts or formal enactments can furnish the only security.

As to the Democrats themselves, we do not flatter ourselves, and we do not advise the public to do so, that we have got rid of them. Where change has become, as it has here, what might be almost called the animating principle of our political system, we are not likely to have, as in older countries, anything which can be fairly called a "Conservative" party, and the Democracy cannot be converted into such a party. The two great divisions of our political world will consist hereafter, not exactly of the knaves and of the honest men, but of those who think the great laws of morality are good political guides, and those who think they are for political purposes of little or no consequence. To this latter party, under whatever name it may be called, or for whatever purpose it may be organized, the débris of the Democratic party is sure to belong. We may rely upon it that wherever we can see a body of men rallying round an abuse with a fair chance of defending it successfully, Mr. George T. Curtis and Mr. Horatio Seymour and their associates will be found in the midst of them, with their hands under their coat-tails, showing that to touch it would break up the framework of society.

That the Democratic party was not simply the pro-slavery party, but the party of rascality and corruption, has, in fact, been thoroughly proved by the strenuous opposition it has always offered in this city to the work of municipal reform.

THE EIGHT-HOUR MOVEMENT.

An article which appeared in The Nation on this subject three weeks ago has called forth some comment from one or two journals, which evidently consider that nobody can be a real friend of the working classes who presumes to differ with them as to the best mode of improving their condition. In the article referred to we endeavored to show, not that it was not highly desirable that working-men should have more leisure for the cultivation of their minds and the enjoyment of social intercourse, but that more leisure was not to be secured by such legislation as they now seek, with such injury to their purely material interests as would deprive their leisure of all value. The answer we get to this is abuse of political economy as the "dismal science," so called by Carlyle, one of the worst enemies of the laborer that has ever put pen to paper, and accusations of "hard-heartedness." Amongst others which have reached us is the following letter:

Mr. Editor: In my younger days I had to earn a living as a mechanic, and worked hard in manufacturing villages in Massachusetts and Connecticut. I reside now in a village where there are woollen, cotton, paper, iron, and other mills; but my income tax paid to the United States collector last summer (assessed on invested property) was over $100. These facts may show that I know by experience the wants of working people, and am not an agrarian in any sense of the word. We have several churches, and grog-shops by the dozen, but no academy, library, lyceum, lectures, nor any organized recreations (except billiards), and the common school is not graded.

In a late number of The Nation I read an article on "the eight-hour movement" which seems to me (studying moral economy as well as political) about as much to the purpose as a treatise on the steam-engine might be. This communication is intended to stir up some one of your set who can conceive of the need that laboring people feel (or ought to feel) of time for recreation and mental culture, and who can write an article that may be suitable for your columns.

At the period of my life when I worked hard, I had a relative who one day enquired about my opportunities for mental improvement. She suggested that I could spend my evenings profitably in reading. I asked if she could take a book after a hard day's work or play (such as an excursion); she replied that she was too tired to read at such times. "Well," said I, "that is the way I feel every night; and I don't get really rested before Monday morning."

I was introduced, not long since, to a young person who boards near us, and works in a woollen mill. To my offer of books, she replied that she had no time to read. Her day's work is 11 hours. She dresses well, but not extravagantly.

I wish capitalists could realize the depression, the sense of drudgery, the jaded feeling of those who labor from 10 to 13 hours.

Several factory girls near us "put all they earn on to their backs," but I have never discovered any better way to cure that than to improve their minds.

If it is not the employers' Christian duty to promote the happiness of their laboring people by affording opportunities for cultivating the mind, then I have read my Testament without understanding, and we shall be no better than the English with their "white slaves." And those of us who have opportunities can be better employed in such business than in patronizing a set of men at the South who, having brain force to rule the country for two generations, may be trusted to work their own States out of their difficulties, and establish true relations between capital and labor.

I wish that the Republican partisans could learn that it would be good policy for them to take up as a political move the lessening of hours of labor. We are a working people, and they are short-sighted who cannot perceive that an intelligent population will not submit to be made such drudges as English operatives are; and that the party that first takes hold of a new issue, and nails it to their platform right-side-up, will get the votes.

One does not often meet with a better exemplification than the foregoing of the kind of mental fog into which even intelligent men may get by steadily looking at a subject through their feelings. Nobody laments more earnestly than we do the disadvantages of all kinds, physical, mental, and moral, under which the working-men labor. We suspect if it were possible to make a thorough comparison of our views it would be found that, ill-satisfied as our correspondent is with the condition of the class to which he belongs, we are far more so. When we glance at the enormous interval which, even here in the most favored country in the world, separates the great mass of the population, as it is, from what it might become with more leisure, more money, more means and appliances of culture, and when we think of the terrible depth of mental and moral darkness into which two-thirds of the rest of the whole human race are plunged, we are only saved from wishing that it might be saved from further misery by total and immediate extinction by a firm and abiding faith that a very different future is in store for it: a future in which most of the mere drudgery of life will be done by the powers of nature, and in which all men will enjoy at least a large measure of those means and opportunities of moral and intellectual enjoyment which are now restricted to the rich. But as to the means of hastening this period there is, of course, room for wide difference of opinion, and we are opposed to the eight-hour movement simply because we believe it will retard it, and we regret extremely to witness the agitation for legislation on the subject because it indicates great ignorance, on the part of the working classes, on a subject on which it is of prime importance to their welfare that they should be well informed.

Whether you can restrict the working day to eight hours without in the long run lowering wages, or, in other words, lessening the demand for labor, is not a question of "moral economy," as our correspondent seems to imagine; and in attempting to decide it on moral grounds he is making as great a mistake as he would have made had he, in his youth, attempted to make himself acquainted with the nature of elastic vapors by a diligent study of Dugald Stewart.

The working day has been in this, and we believe in other States, successfully restricted, or rather fixed, at ten hours by law, because this is about the number of hours which it has been found by experience in most countries that a man can work without injury to his health. It is the number of hours during which there is for the greater part of the year light to work. It is about the number of hours, too, on which calculations as to the productiveness of capital, and the prospect of success in industrial enterprises, all over the world, have been based for centuries. It is very rare that men will work for a longer period, on the average of the year, except for extraordinary inducements, such as large extra wages, or under extraordinary pressure, such as extreme poverty (that is, be it remembered, superabundance of labor), or under the lash. There is, therefore, little or no violence done to the ordinary laws of trade by fixing ten hours as the legal working day. It simply prevents excess in the few cases in which capitalists would be able or willing to exact from laborers sacrifices or exertions injurious to their health or morals, and therefore opposed to public policy.

But when it is proposed to force men to restrict their working to eight hours a day, not on the ground that this is the period during which a man can labor without injury to his physical powers, but on the ground that he needs the rest of the time for reading, society, and music, an entirely new class of considerations comes into play. It is simply an attempt to set aside or nullify one of the natural economical laws by a law of the State, and all such attempts must fail; and to cast imputations on people's humanity for pointing this out, is about as sensible as to abuse a doctor for discouraging a patient from taking a delightful-looking house in a malarious district. Those who are agitating for the change clearly intend that as much wages shall be paid for eight hours' labor as for ten, and they imagine that the value of the two hours of production thus lopped off will come out of the capitalists' profits. To accomplish this, however, the act must not only fix the number of working hours, but provide that the capitalists shall continue to invest as much money as ever in the State in which the act is in force; that they shall, in other words, be content with smaller profits; and shall not move away either with their funds or their skill and enterprise to any other State or country. The working-men, if they can get a majority in favor of their scheme, may try this experiment, but we tell them plainly that the result is just as well known as if it was before our eyes. You cannot prevent capital from going to places where it yields most returns by any amount of legislation, and no attempt to fix it in one place by regulations diminishing profits, or having a tendency to diminish profits, or to excite fears as to the freedom of industry, has ever had or can have any better result than to diminish production, drive capital to more favored localities, lessen the demand for labor, lower wages, and plunge the laborer into a struggle, not for more leisure, but for food and rags. Manufacturing industry is being slowly driven out of this city by the enormous taxation caused by bad government, great as the local advantages are. It can be driven out of any State in the Union by this or any other mode of making profits lower than they are elsewhere. It can be, we will not say driven out of the United States, but diminished in amount all over the Union, and the wages of labor thus be lowered, by the exhibition of a fixed determination on the part of the laboring classes to use their numerical strength to interfere with the free use of it, by limiting the freedom of contract between employer and workman. There is nothing which would alarm capitalists more than such a manifestation as this in a democratic country. They would view it as but the narrow end of the wedge. If the rate of wages be once fixed with reference, not to its market value, but the laborer's desire for intellectual and æsthetic enjoyments, the capitalist is of course launched at once on an ocean of uncertainty. Two hours are wanted to-day for more reading; more may be wanted to-morrow for the higher mathematics, or for experimental chemistry; and six hours may be deemed sufficient for the sordid toil of the mill or the workshop.

We for our part believe that the elevation of the working classes must come, and we feel assured will come, from the gradual and now rapid increase of the world in wealth; from their gradual and now rapid rise in intelligence, thrift, and forethought, and their increasing power of combination. They will become to a greater and greater extent capitalists themselves, by the growth of the co-operative system, and by their economy. Individuals will be influenced more and more by the effect of their conduct on the class at large, and will avoid diminishing its power, and the proportion of wealth to be divided amongst it, by increasing their number too rapidly. But we confess we shall lose much of our hope for their future on the day when we see them abandon their dependence on their own sagacity, freedom, and intelligence, and fall back on the antiquated expedient of meddlesome legislation. We admit that the process we have described is a slow one; that generations may pass away before the consummation is reached which the promoters of the present agitation foolishly flatter themselves an act of the legislature can place before them this very winter. But there is nothing more discouraging in this than in the slow disappearance of any other social evil. This is evidently the way in which God cures the world of its diseases, and we confess we despair of "leagues" or "unions" discovering a better one. The complaint of want of time for self-culture which our correspondent makes, is unhappily a very common one, and is not confined to those who labor with their hands alone. Most of the business men and lawyers of this city reach their homes at night in that very jaded condition which he describes, unfit to converse even with their families, much less to study or play on the guitar. There is not a professional man in the community who does not mourn daily over the absorption of his time and his faculties in the daily task of supporting his family and making a provision for his old age, to the exclusion almost of all attempt to dip into literature or art, or cultivate the highest powers of his mind. Overwork is not the curse of working-men alone, but of all classes except the owners of large fortunes. It is the vice of the age, but its causes and the means of its cure would lead us into a field of discussion for which this is neither the time nor the place. We certainly do not expect to see it banished by an act of the legislature declaring that eight hours shall be the same thing as ten, any more than we expect to see specie payments restored by an act of Congress declaring the paper dollar to be of exactly the same value as the gold one.

THE NATIONAL HIGHWAYS.

In an article with the above title, printed in The Nation on the 5th of October, we endeavored to show that the safety of travellers ought not to be trusted to the railroad companies, nor the supervision of these to the State legislatures, because they are, for the most part, controlled by the railroad companies in all things connected with the interests of the latter. Therefore, if the dangers of travelling are to be diminished, it must be by the interference of the national Government.

There is another reason for this conclusion, and a better one, because founded on a principle which is permanent, and not on a fact which may be, and all must hope will be, temporary. The railroads form a great system, composed of many parts, organized and working together for a common object. This object is the carrying of persons and merchandise in every direction across our wide empire. The several parts of this system are the railroads in each State. But each State can govern only its own roads, and all the States cannot unite to regulate all the railroads, so as to make a harmonious whole. One government for the whole is, therefore, necessary to attain the object sought—safety for travellers everywhere throughout the country.

The railroad companies receive their charters from the States through which they pass. Hitherto they have been governed, if at all, by the laws of those States. Are they, therefore, State institutions and local interests? or, taken as a whole, do they not form a national interest? If so, they come within the scope of national power.

As already stated, railroads, because of the advantages they offer, have become a monopoly. By their superiority over all other means of travelling, they have thrust aside all other means, so that all who travel must travel by them. Stage-coaches have disappeared wherever rail-cars run, and although it is doubtless possible for a man to walk, or ride, or drive from New York to Washington or to Milwaukee, no one ever does it, or ever will, so long as he can go by the railroad without too much risk to life or limb. Thus all the travelling of the country is done by means of the railroads. The exceptions to this general rule are too inconsiderable to affect the argument.

Railroads have thus created the trade and intercourse of the nation—commerce between the States and with foreign states. They are the common highways of the people, and each is a link in a great system by which a continuous stream of travellers from all parts of the country is constantly passing to all parts. At every station "through tickets" can be bought for long routes owned by different companies and chartered by different States. All are supported, not by local custom, but by the travelling of the whole people, and they create and maintain that travelling, which but for them would be impossible. Are not the railroads, then, a national interest, thus sustaining and sustained by the trade and intercourse of the nation? Two interests, each co-extensive with the nation, are related and necessary to each other. To render their union more fruitful of good and less fruitful of evil, wise government by an external power is necessary. What power but that of the nation is equal to the task?

Obviously it is one which the several States could not execute, even if they were not, as before stated, controlled by the railroad companies. These, united by mutual arrangement for the purpose, form continuous lines connecting together the most remote parts of our extended domain. The management of each by the several States would be different. In some it might be judicious, in others ignorant and foolish, and in others there might be none at all, as at present. The traveller, therefore, might be safe to-day and unsafe to-morrow, or safe in the morning and unsafe in the afternoon. As the railroads constitute a great whole, used by the whole people, uniform good management is the thing needed—safety everywhere.

Not only are the railroads necessary to the trade and intercouse of the country, but they have become so to the operations of the Government. They carry the mails, which are essential alike to the Government and to commerce, which extend the influence of the press into every corner of the country, and by bringing to all homes letters, newspapers, and books add so much to the diffusion of knowledge and to domestic and social enjoyments. The post-office, with its present business and usefulness, would be impossible but for the railroads. They are equally important to the Government in time of war, as recent experience proves. Obviously, therefore, as they are at once the highways of the whole people and the chief instrument by which the national Government attains its objects, the railroads ought to be regulated by that Government, whose duty it is to promote the interests of the people and to secure the means necessary to the exercise of its own functions. Unless it can command the railroads, it is powerless both in peace and war.

The case is provided for by the Constitution, although railroads were unknown to those who made it. The general Government is invested with authority over the interests of the nation, and the State governments are confined to local interests. All the powers, express and implied, of Congress are given to enable it "to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." Those which relate specially to our topic are the power "to regulate commerce among the several States," and "to establish post-offices and post-roads." It would much exceed our limits to discuss the various questions to which these clauses have given rise. It may be stated generally that whatever tends, directly and materially, to create and promote trade and intercourse among the States is within the scope of the first-mentioned power. A sound paper currency does this. Therefore, a Bank of the United States to furnish one was constitutional. Free passage over the lakes and rivers of the country does this. Therefore no State can obstruct such passage. Commerce means not merely trade in merchandise, but the intercourse of travellers. "Commerce among the several States" is held to mean "commerce intermingled with the States, and which might pass the external boundary line of each State, and be introduced into the interior," and "to regulate" implies full and exclusive power over the thing to be regulated (1 Kent's Com., 409).

Surely all this is just as applicable to railroads as to rivers, the former having become much the more powerful instrument of commerce among the States. Congress has interfered to provide for the safety of travellers in steamboats, and apparently with good effect, for accidents on these, once so common and so destructive, have, since the action of the Government, greatly diminished. The reasons which invoked and justified the exercise of regulating authority in the case of steamboats apply with even greater force to steam-cars.

The Post-office is a great general interest which it is the duty of Congress to control for the common good. It is needless to enlarge on its importance to the Government and to the people in every part of our wide territory. The present efficiency of the Post-office is due wholly to the railroads. To go back to the stage-coach would be to return to comparative barbarism. The railroads have become, through the force of irresistible causes, post-roads. Congress has power, therefore, to "establish" them, and this phrase has been construed to give authority to designate as post-roads roads already made, or to construct others and control them (Story's Com., chap. 18).

It is necessary for the purposes of the Government, whether in peace or war, that the railroads should be safe. Safety is equally necessary in the working of an instrument by which alone "commerce among the States," in its present condition, can be maintained and promoted. Congress, therefore, has constitutional authority over the railroads.

What Congress ought to do to diminish the risks of travelling, and whether, having the legal authority, it has the practical power to govern the railroad companies, we may perhaps consider hereafter.

"A YANKEE'S" ESCAPE FROM A "LOGICAL DILEMMA."

Some weeks ago we commented on the assertion made by "A Yankee," the New York correspondent of the London Spectator, that the negroes were regarded with loathing by the people of the North, and challenged him to reconcile this with his other statement that, if the negro got the ballot, the whites would soon meet him in the marriage-bed, at the dinner-table, and in the senate. He promised that he would make it all plain in a week or two, and here is his explanation, which has just appeared in the Spectator:

"But if there is an antipathy of race, may not that antipathy be trusted to keep the races apart just as well when they have equal political rights as before? 'Is it, then, compulsory in America to marry an elector?' Such is the reductio ad absurdum put before me, when I say that the negro at the ballot-box means the negro in Congress and the negro in the marriage-bed. This logical bugaboo may look very terrible to those who do not know what it is made of. It supposes that because the mass of people have an aversion for one kind of food, there may not be some whose stomachs or whose needs are strong enough to enable them to eat it. Opium is a soporific drug none the less because, as physicians will tell you, there are some people to whom strong green tea will not bring a more excited sleeplessness. It was but a day or two ago that a gentleman, a Northerner, who had seen much of the South, said to me upon this subject, 'Give the negroes votes, and in a generation, when they got power, and some property, and a little elevation, the low political loafers down there will be marrying them for the sake of political power. The negro vote there would be just like the Irish vote here. The surest way to get it would be to marry a negress, and the vilest and most degraded would get it, or at least make this bid for it; and so we should soon be like Mexico.' Like Mexico! like Mexico! That frightful warning is ever before our eyes. And that what we fear would come is confessed by that 'other Yankee' who undertook to controvert my statements, and whose success, I venture to say, was much like that of the editor above-mentioned. For he says, 'There are thousands of white men who would marry octoroons, quadroons, and mulattoes who never could be induced to mate with a negress; and the same is true of white women.' Never was truer word said. The 'political loafers,' the vile and the degraded, would make the beginning, and then would come in the 'thousands;' and with four or five millions of negroes to begin on, in a generation or two we should have as political people in some parts of the country what Mr. Cobden calls 'a degraded population of half-castes,' which would require the hand of God himself to elevate to civilization."

Now, we confess, all this seems to us as clear as mud. A race which another race regards with loathing—peculiar, indescribable, instinctive—cannot, matrimonially considered, be compared to any kind of drug or food. The question, as "A Yankee" puts it, is really whether some "low political loafers" will eat dirt, and, if they do, whether the rest of the population will gradually acquire their taste, and follow their example. The free choice does not, according to him, lie between beef and pork, or between green tea and opium, but between plain food and garbage. There may be persons in the community who will take to garbage-eating for political ends, but the danger of the taste spreading is an extraordinary reason to give for refraining from an act which per se is plainly our duty. We are here gravely asked in a democratic republic to shut out one-sixth of the population from political rights for ever because there is some likelihood that "some low political loafers" would marry negresses to get negro votes, and that better people would follow suit. This, we confess, is a mode of canvassing of which little has hitherto been heard. The gentleman who has "seen much of the South" has apparently seen very little of the North, if he supposes, as he seems to do, that small politicians are in the habit of marrying Irishwomen as a means of securing political preferment.

Moreover, there must surely be some defect in the mental vision of people who think that if marriage between the two races can be prevented, all danger of a "large population of half-castes" in the United States is avoided. Children, mulattoes as well as others, are, we regret to say, sometimes born out of wedlock. Shocking as it may seem to "A Yankee," a considerable proportion of the colored population of the South is the offspring or descendants of white men, who did not wait for the enfranchisement of the negroes to take a good dose of the opium which, according to "A Yankee," the Anglo-Saxon race regards with such abhorrence. And the indulgence in this soporific will, in our opinion, always exist in the ratio of negro degradation. Everybody who fears the intermixture of races ought to labor for the elevation of the blacks by every means, so that the production of mulattoes shall be impossible except through intermarriage. And so far from believing, as "A Yankee" does, that political enfranchisement would facilitate intermarriage, we believe it would leave it just as rare and difficult as ever. For while thinking that he greatly exaggerates the depth of the popular antipathy to the negro, we believe, as he apparently does not, that it is of that peculiar kind which would make any general legal mixture of blood between the two races outrageously improbable under any circumstances. How anybody who dwells as much and as justly as he does on the Anglo-Saxon pride of race can think it would give way before a wider distribution of the franchise, we do not well see. People who consider the case of Mexico "a frightful warning" to the American people against carrying out their own principles of government, have yet, it seems to us, a great deal to learn as to the proper mode of reasoning on political subjects. There could hardly be a better example than this of the fallacy known as the "chemical method." There are scarcely two points of resemblance between Mexico and this country, either in history, mode of settlement, or composition of population, or relation of races. We might as well take "warning" from the Turkish Empire or from Hungary.

THE SOUTHERN CORRESPONDENCE OF "THE NATION."

(From the London Spectator.)

It seems strange that the energy which characterizes the management of our great journals has not induced some of them to send special correspondents out to the Southern States. Few phases of society could, one would think, be more rich in variety and interest than that through which the former Confederate States are now passing. An almost unparalleled social revolution is now in course of accomplishment south of Mason and Dixon's line, involving the solution not only of some of the [most] important problems which have ever perplexed humanity, but affecting the future status of the restored Union and its relations with England. It would be worth a great deal to us, not only politically but commercially, to know what the real state of the South is now, and what are the genuine feelings of its inhabitants. Next to the Northerners themselves, nobody has so close an interest in obtaining this knowledge as Englishmen, and yet our newspapers furnish us with no information on the subject. If we turn to American newspapers we meet with but little more assistance in our search. In the first place, every Southern correspondent of a Northern paper writes with the view of upholding some theory or supporting some policy with reference to the treatment of the subdued States. The party warfare between Republicans and Democrats, advocates and opponents of negro suffrage, State-rights men, and Federalists, is too keen to permit any careful study of facts, apart from their bearing on theories. Moreover, the art of newspaper correspondence is very partially understood in America. It is an art which after all has only sprung into existence within the last twenty years in this country, and which certainly can never take root in the New World till the American newspapers abandon the barbarous custom of cutting up every letter into short paragraphs, divided by appropriate headings.

Since the close of the war, however, there has been an attempt made to establish in America a newspaper written by and for men of education, and intended to occupy the same position in American journalism as that held by our high-class English weeklies. How far our contemporary, the New York Nation, will prove successful, it is impossible for anybody not resident in the country to guess. Bennett, of the Herald, used to say openly, when any one complained of the character of his journal, that the moment he found there was a want for a high-class, respectable journal in America he should like nothing better than to satisfy it, but at present there existed no public for such a paper. If The Nation should prove by its success that the time has come when a scholar-like, thoughtful, well-written paper can hold its own in the States, one of the reproaches which was most justly levelled against New World civilization will lose its weight. However, our object is not to discuss the existence of an educated public in the States, as evinced by the appearance of a journal like The Nation, but to call attention to some very remarkable reports which have been published in it concerning the condition of the South.

The moment that the South was re-opened The Nation sent a special correspondent to describe the "South as it is," and his letters afford far the most instructive picture that has yet been furnished us of the condition of the Southern States. If he has any theory of his own with reference to the manner in which the political issues of the day ought to be decided, he does not obtrude it upon the reader. His letters are nothing more nor less than the diary of his journey on horseback through the States that so lately were the scene of war. Throughout the correspondence there is an extreme appearance of fairness. Writing to a paper of strong Abolitionist and Union sympathies, he tells all sorts of facts, which, as far as they go, are not in favor of negro suffrage, or of the rehabilitation of the black race. And what is more striking still in the correspondence of a Northern paper, he makes no scruple of reporting the complaints which he hears from returned Confederate soldiers of their sufferings in Federal prisons.

To an English reader there are two features about these letters which suggest curious reflections. The first is the evidence they afford of the extent to which the South was an unknown country to the North before the war. The correspondent, writing to an American journal, repeatedly mentions facts about the habits, customs, scenery, manners, and modes of life of the Southern States of the kind which an English correspondent might mention if writing about Russia, but which he would no more think of mentioning if travelling in Ireland or Scotland than he would of explaining that the Strand was the main thoroughfare of London. Then, too, another odd inference which the English reader derives from the perusal of these letters is, that travelling in the South at this moment is unattended not only with danger, but with any risk of insult or annoyance. The correspondent of The Nation is avowedly a Yankee, with Northern habits and tones of thought and speech. Yet he travels alone amidst the Southern villages, and it never seems to enter his mind that he may be subjected to unpleasantness from the unpopularity of his nation. Now if the feeling of the South towards the North had been at any time of that fierce, irreconcileable antipathy which, we are assured by pro-Southern advocates over here, it partook, it is incredible that such should be the case. Probably a Yankee would be an unwelcome guest in the mansions of such planters as are still left standing, though even this we doubt, judging from the extraordinary sort of intimacy which existed in Europe to our knowledge between Southerners and Northerners, even at the crisis of the war. But it is clear that the people of the Confederacy have no animosity towards Yankees as Yankees, such as the Italians entertained towards the Austrians, or the Poles towards the Russians.

Naturally enough, the attention of The Nation's correspondent is especially devoted to the relations of the conquered States towards the Union. The general sentiment, as far as we can gather from his letters, amongst the people is a sense of relief at the termination of the war. In the words of a ruined planter whom he came across in his wanderings, "The damned thing is all over, and I'm glad it is." The same sentiment is expressed, less tersely, but more thoroughly perhaps, in the speech of a former Confederate officer whom the correspondent overheard laying down his opinions in a bar-room at Richmond: "Our people, sir," he said, "are quiet; nobody talks of insurrection. We go peaceably about our business. We are conquered, and all our actions acknowledge it. We may not love the Yankees; I don't think we pretend to do that; but we have made up our minds to behave as peaceable citizens. We can keep these States in the Union, and we mean to do it. We have tried our best to keep them out, and we admit we can't." Apparently the idea of trying a second insurrection, when the strength of the country is restored, is never contemplated by anybody. Secession is "played out," and the whole energies of the Southern American mind are devoted to making the best of a bad business.

According to these accounts, the time which the South will require to recover from the injuries inflicted on her by the war is not nearly so long as European critics expected. For the moment there is a great scarcity of food and provender, and a general paralysis of agricultural operations, owing to the want of labor. Plenty of cases of ruin and misery are recorded in these letters, but there is no evidence of actual lack of food among the people. The dirt, and discomfort, and shiftlessness of the slave States were so offensive to Northern eyes before the outbreak of the war, that it is difficult for the correspondent to determine how much of the wretchedness he sees is exceptional and how much is normal. Nor as yet has he discovered any traces of extreme destitution even amidst the colored population. Our impression is that the permanent damage caused by the war has been much exaggerated, as far as the country is concerned. You may ravage a country with fire and sword, but after all nature repairs the injury, especially in a tropical climate, with extraordinary celerity. The most permanent loss the South has suffered is in the number of able-bodied young men who perished during the war. In some of the Virginian and Carolina villages there seems to be nobody left except old men and children.

With respect to the freedmen, the feeling of the Southerners, as represented by the authority from which we quote, is well-nigh unanimous. "So far," says he, "as I have seen, all native Southerners, the poorest and most degraded equally with the rich, and people of the most undoubted Unionism as well as Secessionists, unaffectedly and heartily despise the negroes." Truly they are a despised race. Everybody feels contempt, as often, perhaps, mingled with pity as with hatred, for their morals, their mental capacity, and their character as laborers. That the negro is of no use to anybody as a freed laborer appears to be an idée fixe in the Southern mind. As one of the correspondent's interlocutors remarked to him, "The negro, poor fellow! was fated to disappear. Slavery, if it had oppressed him, had at the same time protected him. Give the negro social and political equality. That would make no difference. Being left to stand or fall alone in a competitive struggle for life with a superior race, he would be sure to perish; a system bad for the individual negro had been the preservation of the negro race in America; philanthropists, with their schemes for elevating the man, would find they had exterminated their species. A troublesome question would at any rate be removed from American politics."

These sort of ideas, whether true or false, are certain to prevail after emancipation. They have always been held in every country where race-slavery has been an institution. If the negro cannot hold his own in the Southern States with a fair field for his labor, nothing will preserve the race, nor is it perhaps desirable that the race should be preserved, if this prove to be the case. But the danger is that this preconceived opinion should hinder the negro from having a fair trial. The whole tenor of the letters we quote from seems to show that the Southerners do not treat the freed negro fairly. Employers of labor either expect that the blacks shall work for less than the market value of their labor, or else they exact from them a degree of deference and obedience which can only be maintained by coercion. As far as can be ascertained, the freedmen have worked well enough where they were fairly paid and well treated, but the instances in which they have met with such treatment are very exceptional. In consequence, the negroes are much more inclined to become squatters than to work for wages, and thus the Southerners are committing exactly the same folly which was perpetrated by the Jamaica planters. Out of annoyance at emancipation they are pursuing a course of conduct which must end in the impoverishment of the supply of labor, on which their business depends. Of any deliberate attempt or wish to re-establish slavery as an institution, we find no mention in these reports. Nor are the cases of ill-treatment of the freed slaves more frequent than must inevitably be expected in a state of transition from slavery to freedom.

Correspondence.

THE EPISCOPAL CONVENTION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The late Convention of the Episcopal Church has been subjected to no little reproach for not adopting the resolution offered by Mr. Horace Binney, Jr. Whether the convention is to be commended or condemned, it is entitled to an intelligent judgment upon its action; and there cannot be an intelligent judgment without a knowledge of the nature and functions of the convention and of its permanent policy.

It is not only natural but proper that those should condemn the convention who suppose it to be a gathering of clergymen and laymen to discuss and pass upon moral and religious questions of the day for their mutual benefit and the edification of the people. Such is the character and function of what are called conventions of many religious denominations, of the church congresses now held in England, and of conventions for social and moral science. If such were the character of the Episcopal Convention, it might well be reproached for holding a session of eighteen days and refusing to so much as discuss the questions of slavery, of the late war and its causes, and the moral and social consequences of the Union victory.

But the convention is a body established by the constitution of the Episcopal Church, having specific functions, powers, and purposes. Its members are elected, and have an official and constitutional duty to perform. They do not meet as individuals, to discharge their personal duties, at large, to society and to the church alike. It is a legislative and, in some respects, an administrative body. It has been long settled that the duty and policy of the convention is to avoid all discussion and attempts to procure expressions of opinion upon subjects of a political character, however intimately they may be blended with moral and religious duties. But this does not go to the root of the matter. It has been equally the policy of the convention to refuse to entertain propositions purely theological and religious, unless they are necessary to the discharge of the functions of the convention as a legislative and administrative body. The design is to prevent the convention being turned into a debating society for discussing and voting upon any questions whatever, even though strictly theological.

In 1844 an attempt was made to obtain an expression of the opinion of the convention against the Oxford tracts. The division was not upon the merits or demerits of the tracts, but upon the functions and policy of the convention. The resolutions offered were voted down. The argument was used that the convention owed it to itself, to society, and to the church, to disclaim and denounce the teachings of the tracts, which were having great influence, and that not to do it was dereliction of duty. The action of the convention was misunderstood and denounced by many; but was in harmony with its uniform view of its own proper duties.

In 1859, the convention was in session in Richmond, in the midst of the excitement that attended John Brown's raid. Fears of domestic insurrection prevailed, yet no attempt was made to procure a resolve of the convention in favor of law and order, or deprecating insurrection and violence. Indeed, so careful was the convention in preserving its line, that it refused to vote to call upon the Governor of the State, although the duty of honoring the magistrates was harped upon. So well had this policy become settled and known, that no attempt has ever been made to procure an expression of opinion from the convention containing, even by implication, anything on the subject of slavery in the South, or polygamy in Utah; or, on the other hand, deprecating agitation of those questions. Nothing has ever been done in the interests of either side of the questions of slavery in the States, its extension or abolition, or the right of secession or revolution, or the rights of the general Government and the free States. And this policy is entitled to credit, because it has been uniformly applied to moral and theological questions as well as to political. We think it will be found that the records show no exception to this policy. If there have been any, it is when the resolutions were accepted without objection, and on matters of courtesy, or from unanimity.

So much for the functions and policy of the convention. Now, as to the resolution of Mr. Binney.

The House of Bishops sent down a notice for a Thanksgiving service "for the return of peace to the country and unity to the church." Mr. Binney moved a resolution requesting the bishop to offer especial thanks for the removal of slavery, which it declared to have been the cause of the late troubles. The resolution was laid upon the table.

There can be no doubt that this vote is owing to the view entertained by a majority as to the duty and policy of the convention in all such cases as these. It was not a vote on the question whether the church should or should not be thankful that slavery was abolished, or did or did not think slavery to have been the cause of the war. The division was on the question whether the convention should discuss and attempt to pass upon those questions, and in that connection. The objections to Mr. Binney's resolution were twofold. First, that it required an opinion of the convention that slavery was the cause of our troubles; a subject the discussion and decision of which would be contrary to the uniform construction of the duty and policy of the convention. Second, that it limited the national thanksgiving service, and specified the reasons for it, instead of leaving them general and open. All could unite in giving thanks for the restoration of peace and unity in church and state, while there might be, and in a church including the Southern States would be, varieties of opinion as to the only cause, the chief cause, or one of the causes of the war, and, possibly, as to whether the overthrow of slavery was cause of thankfulness. At all events, it was thought best to have a thanksgiving service of the general character proposed by the bishops. A strong reason in favor of the course proposed by the bishops was, that it did not, by the faintest implication, negative or tend to negative, or even to ignore, the propositions of Mr. Binney. The original resolution no more denied or ignored that slavery was the cause of the war, and its removal a blessing, than it did that the doctrine of the right of secession led to the war, and that our thanks and gratitude were due to the army and navy for conquering peace and unity. It left all these things open and untouched.

The question was this: Shall the whole convention unite in a thanksgiving for the return of peace and unity, without more, or shall it not? If the plan of the bishops was adopted, that could be done. If Mr. Binney's amendment was adopted, it could not be done; but a majority would have forced into the service a declaration upon a question historical, political, and moral, as to which some might differ, and others prefer not to consider in that convention, and which the original left open and untouched.

In view of these circumstances and reasons, is not the convention to be justified by loyal and anti-slavery men, or, at least, credited and respected?

FRANCE.

MADEMOISELLE THÉRÈSE.

Paris, October 27, 1865.

The gaieties of Paris have always attracted a host of strangers, and have been for our capital a source of great wealth; our theatres have been a school of wit, of manners, of urbanity. In all our public places and amusements there has always been found an æsthetic element; but the physiognomy of Paris, so dear and so familiar to me, begins already to wear the signs of that depravity which has been encouraged and created by the despotism of the Second Empire. The symptoms of this growing depravity are numerous. Far be it from me to wish that Paris should become a stiff and Puritan town, but there should be some decency in pleasure, some delicacy in freedom. Decency and delicacy are now thrown aside. The most popular singer in the public places of Paris is a certain Thérèse, whose fame has perhaps not yet reached your ears, but with whom it is time you should become acquainted, as she is a "representative woman." In the summer she sings in one of the café concerts of the Champs Elysées in the open air, under the old and dusty elm trees; in winter, in a hall called Café de l'Alcazar. Having heard so much of her, I had a few days ago the curiosity to go to the latter place. With great difficulty I pushed my way through a motley crowd, composed of workmen and workwomen, of clerks, of young and elegant gandins (dandies), and of lorettes; silk gowns were to be seen near blouses; the newest and lightest bonnets near old-fashioned muslin caps; the fragrance of the best Brévas was mixed with the smoke of the clay pipes. A thousand men and women were pressed round small marble tables covered with glasses, and the noise hardly allowed the unfortunate singers, who presented themselves on a small stage at the end of the room, to be heard. Who cared about the fat barytone who sang in a lugubrious tone some air of Donizetti? Who cared even about the comique, whose grimaces had something sad and melancholy, as had his worn-out black coat and his shirt-col ars of dubious white? Thérèse! Thérèse! Now she appears at last, the queen of the Alcazar. After deafening applause comes a great silence, and she begins. She is dressed in the handsomest silk that Lyons can weave, but its very beauty makes her appear uglier; for she is ugly—there is not a good feature in her face, and her anatomy is singularly deficient. She begins: her sharp and thrilling voice fills the great hall; her pronunciation is the most perfect I ever heard—not a word, not a syllable is lost; but, alas! what words and what syllables! Her specialty is to sing indecent songs, and her talent consists in underlining, if I may use the expression, every indecent verse or word; her voice, at times very pure, assumes at others an indescribable coarseness; her gestures, her movements, and her pantomime would make, as the French proverb says, "a dragoon blush." But there are few dragoons in the audience; every allusion, every equivocal thought, is received with tremendous cheers. To me the audience was the real spectacle, and a sad and humiliating one. In old times I had witnessed the same sort of enthusiasm in the same places, but then it always followed a patriotic song. Thérèse has taken the place of Béranger. From her songs the patriotic verses have carefully been excluded by the police; for every one of them is examined by the Censure before it can be sung in public.

The admiration for Thérèse is not confined to the lower classes. Last winter the queen of the Alcazar was also the queen of the salons. A good and pious duchess, whom I will not name because she regrets what she has done, was the first to invite Thérèse to her house, and she received an ovation there at the hands of all that is most noble and refined in Paris. At the house of Madame K——, the wife of one of our richest manufacturers, Thérèse sang in the presence of M. Brittelle, the préfet de police. After one of her pieces, a gentleman said to her: "You don't sing this at the Alcazar." "No," said she, "the préfet de police would not allow it." At another house, at Madame S——'s, after Thérèse had gone through her now celebrated répertoire, a charming young woman, who looks like one of Raphael's virgins, conversed with her, and finally said, "Mademoiselle, could you not sing another piece, something—what shall I say?—de plus fort?" "No, madame," was the answer, "I don't know anything de plus fort." Not a bad answer for a Thérèse.

The growing corruption of the people is a natural effect of a system which has reduced politics to the old Roman formula, "panem et circenses." Enormous palaces have been built where the workmen spend their evenings. In the great café of the Boulevard de Sebastopol you may see them every night round a hundred billiard-tables, and in the blaze of a thousand gas-lights. The gilded halls, the velvet-cushioned sofas where they can lie, the splendor, the noise, of these new palaces, keep them away from their families from the small and dark room where their deserted wives and children remain. They must be corrupted by all means: cheap papers are printed for them, such as the Petit Journal (price one sou), where there is not a word of politics. The political newspapers, all of which are submitted to the stamp-tax, can no longer compete with this silly paper, full of sensation novels and of disguised imperialism. Of all liberties, the one which has been given to us is la liberté des théâtres. New theatres are built everywhere; every director now can have a corps de ballet, and there is no minimum limit to the length of the petticoats. The new féerie called the Biche au Bois, which has gone through more than 200 representations, is an exhibition such as Paris never witnessed before. No Turkish pasha, no slave merchant of the East, ever collected such a number of young beauties; compared to the tableaux of this féerie, Greek mythology seems chaste and paganism innocent. The music of Offenbach is the fit accompaniment of the danse macabre of the present age. In his last operas, Orphée, and the Belle Hélène, the gods of Olympus, dance the dances of Mabille, and converse in the language of the quartier Bréda. Do you remember a beautiful piece of Heine on the Greek gods? How beautiful and poetical are the lamentations of Jupiter, Venus, and Minerva, driven from the sacred mountain. Now, alas! Jupiter and Venus and Minerva are vulgar buffoons, and blaspheme against their own divinity. This coarse, low, vulgar vein is found everywhere. The morality of the nation has descended to the lowest ebb. A young profligate, who died a few weeks ago of consumption, the Duke de Grammont-Caderousse, one of the best names of France, has publicly left a legacy of 60,000 francs to Venus: I mean the Venus of Offenbach, whose name is M'lle Schneider, as the interest of a sum of 12,000 francs which she had lent him. He was almost entirely ruined; he used to spend the whole night playing cards; in the early morning he saddled one of his horses and took a ride to calm his nervous system. He returned home chilled and tired, and took a half bottle of brandy before going to bed. Such was the wretched life of one who was always spoken of as a leader of fashion. The story of his adventures and duels might fill a volume. In the midst of what people call pleasure, he was in fact very unhappy. He despised the people among whom he lived, and despised himself. Nobody ever spoke with a more cruel sincerity of the Bonapartist society, where he found courtiers and admirers. He was brave, full of energy, and felt that his life was lost in idleness. As there was no worthy object of ambition for him, he gave himself up to every vice. How many there are among us who feel the same disgust for the present, the same contempt for the vanities and lies of which they are nevertheless the victims!

I hope you will not form too hasty conclusions from the picture I have drawn, and I cannot but hope that the immorality I have described is only skin-deep. There is a vitality and activity in the French character which must find an opening. When every noble passion is banished, when the pleasures of liberty can no longer be enjoyed, this energy seeks every new channel, it runs in every possible direction. Under the apparent gaiety of the age, there is a profound wound which nothing can heal. The new generations, who are innocent of the faults of the past, and who feel themselves excluded from the field of political life, suffer tortures which no one can understand who has not spent years under a permanent sense of shame, of wounded pride, and of humiliation. The frivolity of the eighteenth century, which preceded the great revolution of 1798, was not more deceitful than the cynical tone of the present period. The stranger who goes through Paris and feels bewildered by so much luxury, pleasure, and gaiety ignores perforce an inner and deeper life; he does not receive the confidences of so many victims; he may think that "tout est pour le mieux dans le meilleur des Empires." How many Englishmen have I not heard, escaped from the smoke of London and the mist of British melancholy, expressing a sort of childish admiration at the sight of Paris, its splendors and its prosperity! They do not know, they never will understand, that under all this something is hidden which their eye cannot see; there is a heart still in the bosom of this Babylon, and she will herself some day tear off the vain garments, the false ornaments, which now adorn her, and astonish the world.

AMERICAN CATTLE.

THE traveller in Europe cannot fail to have noticed that the cattle of one small province or canton will often differ widely from those of another and a neighboring province, and that the stock of each possesses a great degree of uniformity in appearance. Particularly is this the case on the Continent. Thus in ascending the Rhine, the broad, rich polders of Holland are thickly covered with a fine class of large black and white cattle, of a remarkable similarity in form and characteristics. This general color prevails all around the marshy districts as far as the Weser, it might almost be said as far as the Elbe.

And so in Switzerland, the large and stately Bernese and Fribourg cattle differ widely from those of Lucerne and the Grisons, both in color and size. These races, again, differ essentially from those in the valleys of the Bernese Alps, through the Simmenthal and other localities, familiar to every American traveller. No one who has seen them can fail to have marked the peculiar cattle of Tuscany, all more or less dark grey in color, all uniform in appearance, with long and graceful horns. These were the descendants, no doubt, of the stock driven from the broad plains of Hungary during the early invasions of Italy by the Huns and other roving barbarians. In descending the Danube, below Vienna, thousands of herds will be seen to graze along its winding banks, unique in form and character, with horns often branching seven or eight feet, and limbs slender and graceful as a deer. This race, according to the opinion of some naturalists, is the great original source from which the cattle of Europe sprang. It now appears under the general name of Hungarian.

The same is true, to a great extent, of every country in Germany; that is, each has its distinctive race or breed, differing, more or less, from the cattle of all other countries. This difference may be a little less marked in England, but it is nevertheless quite perceptible in the different counties. Thus, in coming among the apple-covered farms of Herefordshire, a remarkably beautiful white-faced animal grazes the hill-sides; in entering the picturesque Devonshire, the color of all the cattle is an almost uniform red, and so on.

This uniformity is nowhere found among the common stock of the United States. The early importations made by the colonies established in various parts of the country came from widely different stocks, some from England, some from Holland, some from Denmark, some from Sweden, and others from the West Indies. They got wonderfully mixed up in the course of a few years, nor is it surprising that they did.

The first cattle brought to this country were those landed at the James River, some time previous to 1609. The colony was established in 1607. Others arrived there in 1610, and the next year a hundred head were received by that colony. The first that came were, no doubt, brought over by the early adventurers from England; but, subsequently to their arrival, others appear to have been procured from the West Indies; others came from Ireland. Those from the West India Islands were the descendants of cattle brought over by Columbus, in his second voyage to America in 1493.

So important were these early acquisitions of stock considered, that an order appears to have been issued forbidding the killing of domestic animals on pain of death to the principal, burning of the hand and cropping the ears of the accessory, and a sound whipping of twenty-four hours to the concealer of the facts. This was encouragement with a vengeance to the raising of stock, and it had the intended effect, for in 1620 the neat stock of Virginia numbered no less than 500 head, and in 1639 it had risen to 30,000, when the restriction against the slaughter seems to have been removed and the number began to decrease. Many cattle were sent from the Virginia colony to New England.

The first cattle received by the Plymouth colony came over in the ship Charity in 1624, being imported by Governor Winslow. In 1627 they had so far increased that a division of them among the colonists took place, some of them being described as black and brindle, showing no uniformity. The same year, 1627, the Swedish West India Company imported some stock for their settlers along the Delaware River, and these, together with those imported by the Dutch West India Company into New York, must have swelled the aggregate number in the country by the year 1630 to some thousands.

In the course of two or three years after this date, Mason and Gorges brought over considerable numbers of large yellow cattle from Denmark for the purpose of carrying on the lumber business along the Piscataqua River, in New Hampshire. These cattle became widely diffused over that region, and maintained their position till within the memory of men still living. Indeed traces of them may still be seen. They were large and coarse, but well calculated to endure the rigors of a northern climate. They unquestionably did much to lay the foundation of what is called the "native" cattle of New England, for they became mixed, in a few years, with the cattle imported into Plymouth and Salem, and with the Dutch from New York, and to some extent, no doubt, with the stock of the James River and the Delaware colonies.

Such and so varied were the sources from which our common stock sprang. There were the black cattle of Spain, the red from the coast of Devonshire, the black and white Dutch from the island of Texel and the coast of Holland, the yellow cattle of Denmark and the marsh regions, and the Swedes from still further north. The crosses between these widely distinct stocks were inevitable and almost infinite.

It could not be expected that these intermixtures would produce any uniformity in the produce, either in color, form, or other characteristics. The offspring of the crosses of the Denmarks with the Spanish and Welsh would naturally be a dark brindle; with the Denmarks and the Devons, a light or yellowish brindle; and more recent importations have produced more or less of a spotted progeny.

A stock made up in this way could not form a distinctly marked race or breed, and thus it happened that we had no fixed breeds in this country till the more modern importations from abroad. The term race, in stock, applies only to animals of the same species possessing, besides the general characteristics of that species, other characteristics which they owe to the influence of climate, soil, nourishment, and the habits of life to which they have been long subjected by man, and which they transmit with certainty to their progeny; and it is essential that they should have possessed these characteristics from a time "whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary."

The term breed, on the other hand, applies to a family of animals built up by a long course of careful breeding and selection till certain desired characteristics become fixed, capable, and sure of being transmitted. The peculiarities of races are more inherent, more fixed and strongly marked than those of families or breeds built up artificially. Tried by this standard, the "native" or the common stock of the country cannot constitute either a race or a breed, since they do not possess any characteristics, peculiar to them all, which they transmit with any certainty to their offspring, either of form, size, color, milking or working properties. They have neither the size, the symmetry, nor the early maturity of the short-horns; they have neither the fineness of bone, the beauty of form and color, nor the activity of the Devons and the Herefords; they do not give the uniform quantity nor the high quality of the Ayrshires and the Jerseys; but their most important failing is that they do not transmit the many good qualities which they often possess, to an extraordinary degree, to their offspring, which is the characteristic of all well-established breeds.

Considering the hardships to which the cattle of the early colonists were subjected, the want of shelter and care, the want of food often, and proper treatment, it is most remarkable that they have come down to our times as good as they are. See what old Glover, who lived in those days, says of the mode of keeping stock in Virginia: "All the inhabitants give their cattle in winter is only the husks of their Indian corn, unless it be some of them that have a little wheat-straw; neither do they give them any more of these than will serve to keep them alive; by reason whereof they venture into the marshy grounds and swamps for food, where very many are lost." And Clayton, too, also writing considerably more than a century ago, says that "they neither housed nor milked their cows in winter, having a notion that it would kill them."

A Swedish traveller, Kalm, in 1749, says "their cattle are allowed to wander through the woods and uncultivated grounds, where they are half starved, having long ago extirpated almost all the annual grasses by cropping them too early in the spring, before they had time to form their flowers or to shed their seeds." The cattle diminished in size till they became stunted and small, and went under the name of "little runts." Nor did the stock in other parts of the country fare much better. In severe winters many animals died of starvation and want of shelter. No efforts were made at improvement till within a recent period. Less than half a century probably would cover all the systematic attempts that have been made to increase the quality and value of the cattle of the country.

Indeed, no well directed efforts at improvement had been made even in England till towards the close of the last century, when Bakewell "sat in the huge chimney corner of a large kitchen, hung round with the finest joints of his dried oxen, preserved as specimens of proportions." His efforts at improvement were the first, but there was no general interest in the subject. Bakewell was a man of remarkable sagacity and close observation, and it was his aim to establish a new system of animal development. Size in itself was no object with him. He wanted to build up a breed that would yield the greatest amount of salable beef for the food consumed, and to put the beef on the best parts, where it would bring the most money.

It was an old notion that where you had large bones there was plenty of room to lay the flesh on. To Bakewell's mind this was a mistake. He began with the proposition that "the smaller the bone, the truer will be the make of the beast, the quicker she will fatten, and her weight will have a larger proportion of valuable meat," and since his day the greatest physiologists have shown, upon the highest scientific principles, that the formation of a large bony system is the result of defective nutrition.

Bakewell's efforts were directed to the perfection of the long-horns, a class of cattle then found in the midland counties, and his skill and perseverance secured a complete triumph. Then came some enterprising men, who devoted their attention to the short-horns, then known as Durhams, and found along the Teeswater. Little more than three-quarters of a century covers the history of this remarkable breed, now the most fashionable and the most highly cultivated of any in the world. Vast sums of money have been devoted to its improvement, but it has more than repaid them.

The Ayrshire became somewhat noted for its dairy qualities not long after, while the Devon and the Hereford are old original races, indigenous to the localities whose names they bear, but they have been vastly improved within the last half century.

The efforts made in England soon became known in this country, and a desire began to manifest itself to do something to improve the stock of our farms as early as the close of the last century. But it was confined to a few. There was no general interest in this movement. The American farmer had but little idea of the capacity of his stock, under proper management, for the production of milk and beef. He could not appreciate the fact that the cow was, after all, only a machine for production, and that her yield, like any other piece of machinery, was in proportion to the perfection of her system, and the raw material fed to her to obtain this production. The animal economy was little understood.

In another article we propose to speak of the growing interest and information in this branch of rural economy, and to show how far importations of foreign stock have influenced our own, and what sections of the country have experienced the greatest benefits from these importations.

HAIR AND HAIRDRESSING.

We are told that when Rip Van Winkle returned to his friends after that unavoidable absence, he amazed them by the fashion of his clothes, and they amazed him quite as much in the same way. I fancy that to a person shut up, say in the Southern States, during the troubles of the past five years, and then suddenly placed in the Academy of Music on the opening night, a few months ago, the mutual surprise must have been similar. Let us fancy that I am such a person—probably I shall not deny that I am.

When I left New York in December, 1860, women wore their hair in a simple and graceful style, which only elicited comment inasmuch as it was luxuriant, or well-smoothed, or richly colored. I come back to find such monstrous and extraordinary coiffures that, in the matter of fashions, I shall only speak to-day of the effect upon my eyes and mind of these curious capillary shapes. My Rip Van Winkleism could get no further than the heads of my countrywomen, and if any one wishes to profit by the unfolding of my impressions on that occasion, let him or her read on.

It was in vain that Miss Kellogg rendered Margherita in a way that, a critical friend assured me, would, thirty years hence, indissolubly connect her name with the heroine of "Faust." I answered, "Yes, yes," smiled, and scarcely listened. I know it was very, very musically wicked, but, good heavens! pray make allowance for weak human nature when brought suddenly face to face with the present forests, and fences, and rivulets, and weapons of human hair. Weapons! certainly. If a "waterfall" or "chignon," which is as hard, as big, and as round as the demi-spheroid of a sixteen-pounder cannon-ball, cannot be considered in the light of a missile, offensive or defensive, what is?

But even in Margherita I soon discovered that there was food for my special line of thought and bewilderment that night. True, her beautiful braids of the traditional blonde hue were as unsophisticated, as guiltless of spangles and glass tails, of "invisible" nets and full-blown roses, of "rats" and gilt bands, as were those of Goethe's Pearl. How, then? Thus. I had left Miss Kellogg a dark-haired young girl, on the eve of her plunge into public life, and this "crown of hair, yellow-golden" costs her, whenever she sports it, a good many dollars and a day's labor. An artiste en cheveux in these times turns old-fashioned Dame Nature out of doors whenever he has a mind so to do, or tinges one's locks to suit one's dresses. Benedick need no longer be so obliging as to leave his love's hair to "be of what color it please God;" he can please himself by varying it every day in the week—if he has the money, and she is willing to scorch and dye "woman's greatest ornament," as the advertisements say.

Scorching is a torture and a vexation of daily occurrence, however, in every belle's list of "ways to look pretty," for, as I dreamily glanced around the opera-house, taking in with a sort of stupefaction the variety of wondrous coiffures, I still had sense enough to note with distinctness the crisp little crêpês which whisper of pincers and hot hair-pins. What a mercy it is that the hair-dressers have steady hands! Otherwise branded brows would become rather a mark of fashion, to the detriment of poetical speech. How distressing for an admirer to be forced to allude to that forehead, "white as snow, where" the curling-tongs "have set their seal!" Curling-tongs vice "innocence," "intellect," "sweetness," etc., crowded out long since by the exigencies of the mal peignée.

Gradually my mind and powers generally rose to a proper appreciation of what woman will endure in a good cause, and at length having, as I thought, finely compassed the subject, I opened my lips; I took up my parable and thus spake:

"Oh, my friend! how long has this been going on? How long have my countrywomen studied the hideous, as being the proper style during these terrible years of suffering and sorrow? They wore these 'so-called' adornments, they disfigured themselves, to drive the men into the field, did they not? Was it not a splendid exercise of that feminine courage—the moral courage which stops at no needful sacrifice—to rob themselves of grace and charm, beginning at their very heads, so as to induce their lovers and husbands to fly from such Medusas? I look upon them with reverence! Southern women knitted socks, and ate corn-bread, and, I regret to say, talked very fiercely against their Northern kinsfolk, and they girded on the swords of their sweethearts and of every man they saw, and cheered them 'to the front;' but it never occurred to the silly creatures to make themselves so ugly and ridiculous that 'camps' should be a relief to the wounded eyes of all mankind.

"Yes, I can fancy that a man might be brought to march up to a 'masked battery,' but never, willingly, to that patriotic lady without a mask who has her waterfall tied up in five yards of scarlet ribbon; who wears a gilt butterfly above one ear, and a humming-bird over the other; whose 'rats' are crowned with a row of curls and three white roses, and who 'carries weight' besides, in the shape of two ear-rings seemingly just plucked from the chandelier-lustres!

> Her nose is—red, ...

Yes; I can understand that her husband worshipped the flag, and was perfectly resigned to die under its folds!"

As I paused, breathless, my companion broke in with a deep-toned prophecy:

"I shall yet see you, O scoffer! even such as these are! But you are indeed casting a retrospective glance. To-night you are gazing on fragmentary portions of a 'has been.' A decree has gone forth, so I am told, against that invention of infinite variety—the waterfall. No longer shall it take its obtrusive place upon the spinal column of the fair sex; already there is a change perceptible—the waterfall of last winter is not the CHIGNON of this autumn. That was drooping and expansive, THIS is shooting off and tightly packed. It is, as you justly remarked, 'tied up' with rather the air of a cotton bale—such a looking thing, in a word, as a pincushion made for a bazaar, and to represent the defunct 'king' whose reputed power has caused such mischief. Standing away from the nape of the neck as this 'ornament' now does, it is said to be in the Grecian style, and that is why those antique bands of purest brass encircle the head. Those are Grecian, too."

I bowed assentingly.

"If you wish, therefore, to study the future, and not the fast-fleeting present, turn your eyes to that lady recently returned from Europe. She sits in an attitude much admired in Paris, which, therefore, she refuses to quit for one instant. Her poor neck must be sadly tired of that twist; but one night, while abroad, she so sat, and it was considered 'effective.' She will never sit otherwise again in public. You observed that her head is an exact reproduction of the Empress Josephine's. Eugénie is—may I say it?—played out. Having admired Josephine, I will next show you Madame d'Abrantes. She is also just from Paris. Now, you must make up your mind to put a thick braid just across your forehead, and then below that a fringe of tiny curls running all about your head. You must bandage said head as if suffering from intense neuralgia, and if, when you get through, you are supposed to have enough hair to fill a bushel-basket, and yet well 'kept under,' why, you will do!"

"Never!" I exclaimed. "These fashions are absurd, costly, unbecoming. I shall never . . . . . etc., etc., etc."

Alas! the next week I was at Dibblee's having my hair dressed!

I already wore two rats and "the demi-spheroid chignon," and while the accomplished forewoman was assuring me of the "silky softness of my hair," and its "exquisite color" (she had just "pinched it on burning pins"), I entered into negotiations with her to exchange some former fancy ball ringlets, which did not match my own, for the newest style of "thick braid and fringe of tiny curls!"

Swept along on the mad current of modish taste and flattery, I paid the penalty of inconsistency and weakness.

The forewoman swore by the nine gods that "hair which had been worn lost its value;" poor little Crow as I was, I never asked Miss Fox if the hair they sold grew on trees. I was horribly cheated, and dropped my cheese as easily and complacently as my prototype.

Moral No. 1. Never rail against a fashion; rest assured that if that puissant IT ordains that the sweetest and prettiest head-dress is an old shoe, you will find yourself very soon walking about the world with your oldest pair jauntily balanced on your flowing locks.

Moral No. 2 is so simple that I will not insult the intellect of my readers by suggesting it.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

MANY years ago Dr. Arnold, while lamenting the decay of a relish for, and interest in, sound literature, perceptible among the youth under his charge at Rugby, attributed the falling off to the general circulation of books of a frivolous cast, especially serial works published in numbers, as the novels of Dickens, etc., which penetrated everywhere and left the minds of their readers utterly indisposed for graver studies. Twenty or thirty years' experience has shown a lower depth of degradation in public taste. The dreary trash that is known as "comic" literature forms the best-paying and most extensively sold class of books now produced. "Artemus Ward" is purchased by myriads, and "The Adventures of Mr. Verdant Green" is advertised as in its "ninetieth thousand." These are only samples of a class too numerous to mention. The effect of this circulation is so visible as to call for remark in the report of the Parliamentary Committee on Public Education in England. One of the late Eton masters says: "The taste fo good English literature has sensibly declined at public schools; cheap and worthless novels form the staple of a modern school-boy's reading when he reads for his own amusement. Formerly any average boy of ordinary taste at Eton, on leaving school, had read most of the English poets, and a great deal of English history as well as other literature. I know very well that the boys used greedily to devour every poem of Sir Walter Scott, Lord Byron, and Southey, and other modern poets, as fast as they came out. The boys used to spend a great deal of their pocket-money in buying English books. Dante, Tasso, and other Italian authors were read by many. The old English dramatists, a good deal of Dryden, a great deal of Pope, and an immense deal of other English poetry were then read at Eton; but now, I doubt whether you could find many boys out of the whole eight hundred that Eton contains who have read ten plays of Shakespeare."

—The New York Historical Society has recently received a donation of peculiar value and appropriateness from General John Watts Depeyster, author of a "History of Carausius," and of other valuable monographs connected with the land of his ancestors. He has just presented to the society his entire collection of Dutch books and works relating to the history of Holland, amounting to several hundred volumes, brought together in Europe, at a large expenditure of time and money, for his own purposes of literary research. From the limited range of readers that it counts, books in the language of Holland are always rare in other countries of Europe, and the well-known patriotism of the Dutch induces them to place a high pecuniary value on the works that contain the records of their country's glory. This gift undoubtedly makes the library of the Historical Society the richest collection in the United States of books that illustrate the native country of the colonists of "Nieuw Amsterdam," whose traditional remains and relics find shelter in the halls of the institution devoted to memories of the past.

—To all interested in the great names of English life and literature for the past three-quarters of a century, the "Extracts from the Journals and Correspondence of Miss Berry, from 1783 to 1852," form very pleasant reading. The editress, Lady Theresa Lewis, might, perhaps, in the exercise of a severer judgment, have retrenched some of the diaries of foreign travel that have now only a historical interest to recommend them, but enough remains in the pictures of English society to give delightful glimpses of persons that the world is not yet tired of hearing about. Sydney Smith is one of these, and several of his inimitable letters testify to his friendship for the sisters who formed a connecting link between the social life of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. In 1824 they paid him a visit at his Yorkshire vicarage of Foston, the creation of his own hands, and called by his friends the ugliest but most comfortable house in England. A literary rarity, a poem by Sydney Smith, was written at this time. In it Virgil's sixth eclogue, where Silenus is bound by two shepherds, and only released on condition of imparting to them the lessons of his experience, is humorously travestied—"Vernon and Beverley, two graceful swains," representing the shepherds, and "Sidneian Smith" himself the wizard sage. It is given at length in the journal, and we extract some passages relating to his improvements in his remote parsonage, where he describes himself as "twelve miles from a lemon." They will recall to most the amusing details given by his daughter, Lady Holland, in her charming biography of her father. Sydney loquitur:

"When first I came to Foston, gentle swains,
Chaos and night possessed these fertile plains;
Clods were unformed, and plough was quite unknown;
Verdure ne'er sprung, and Phœbus never shone;
Chaos I chased away with all his storms,
Then things at last assumed their present forms:
Trees 'rose, woods waved, and animals began
To roam abroad, and know their master, man.
The plough, the drill, the pickaxe, and the spade,
These fields, these pastures, and this plenty made;
Where unformed matter lay, now nods yon corn,
And oats and turnips all these hills adorn.
Then might you see bricks baking at my will;
I formed yon cow-house with my plastic skill:
These walls are mine, and all the joys they know
Spring from my arts, and from my prudence grow.

The poker, tongs, and shovel—rebels three,
Whom on my hearth suspended from you see,
Who for four centuries mankind defied—
Have bent to me; I checked their noisy pride,
I hooked their noses, I reduced their reign;
Ne'er shall you see them tumble down again;
Ne'er shall you hear their cursed outrageous din:
With me, your peace and their repose begin.

That leaned scratching-pole that yonder stands
Owes its existence to my curious hands:
Framed for all animals, or great or small,
It perfect satisfaction gives to all;
Their rumps, their tails, their flea-bit backs confess
How e'en in scratching-poles a priest may bless.

I know all drugs, all simples, and all pills;
I cure diseases, and I send no bills;
The poor old women now no lameness know;
Rheumatics leave their hand, the gout their toe.
Fell atrophy has fled from Foston plains,
And health, and peace, and joy, and love prevails."

—Mr. T. H. Morell, of 134 Fulton Street, whose re-impression of the original edition of Colden's "History of the Indian Nations" is among the choicest of the modern reprints of rare and unique books, has opened proposals for publishing by subscription a new theatrical history, entitled "Records of the New York Stage, Historical and Biographical, from 1750 to 1860." We are not sufficiently acquainted with current literary history to say who it is that, under the initials H. N. D., is announced as the author, but the fulness of detail with which the subject will be treated is shown by the anticipated size of the book. It is expected to form two octavo volumes of about 600 pages each. The edition will consist of two hundred copies in octavo, and sixty in quarto. It commences two years before the period occupied by Dunlap's "History of the American Theatre," and comes down fifty years later. As a book of dramatic and literary reference it bids fair to equal—making allowance for the more limited subject—that curious monument of persevering industry, "Account of the English Stage from the Restoration in 1660 to 1830," in ten volumes octavo (1832). The author, of whom nothing is recorded except his name and profession, the Rev. John Geneste, a clergyman of Bath, gives in this work an abstract of the play bills of the leading London theatres on every night of performance for one hundred and seventy years, and also a synopsis of the plot of every dramatic piece published in England, with biographies of actors and actresses, etc. Many years' labor at the British Museum were devoted to the collection of materials for the work. The singular choice of subject for a clergyman seems to have indisposed the public to acknowledge its usefulness as a book of reference, and copies formerly sold for little more than their value as waste paper. It is now rather rising in price, and deserves a place in every collection where English literature is a special object.

—Now that once more we have "peace brooding o'er the hushed domain," poetry is re-assuming its place among the cherished gratifications that the world so freely expatiates in the enjoyment of, when the pressure of impending momentous events is once removed. A new volume, by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, is now in press, and will appear about December 1. It will comprise the well-known "War Lyrics," "Lyrics of the Heart," and many new poems by this authoress. A collected edition of the poems of Henry Howard Brownell is also announced, and will be welcome to all who have made acquaintance with his stirring lyrics in their detached and separate shapes. Nor are the elder masters of song forgotten. The "Poems Relating to the American Revolution," by Philip Freneau, now in press by Mr. W. J. Widdleton, under the scholarly editing of Evert A. Duyckinck, will introduce to many readers of the present generation one whom their fathers were accustomed to regard with feelings that the present era can hardly see reproduced. The collection is made from the scattered remains of Freneau, the historical poems never having been brought together before. They will be illustrated with notes and an introductory memoir by the editor. It is intended to be followed by a second volume in uniform style, including the Indian poems, the humorous, sentimental, and miscellaneous poems, so as to form a complete presentment of the genius of an author whose influence in the affairs of his time would alone impart a lasting value to his works, independently of their intrinsic merit.

—The characteristic and national manifestation of the genius of an epoch known collectively as the Elizabethan drama seems destined to make the tour of the world, and to meet with recognition among nations who have, in other things, scarcely a single principle of taste in common. Anglo-Saxon America shows its devotion by spontaneous contributions for a monument to Shakespeare, at the very time when a similar proposition in his native country was unsuccessfully brought forward and met with nothing but indifference and neglect. Teutonic Germany has long been known as yielding the warmest adherents to this study, so that it is not remarkable to hear of a meeting of a new Shakespeare society at Weimar, numbering one hundred and twenty members, mostly distinguished literary men, with Dr. Ulrici, the learned commentator on "Shakespeare's Dramatic Art," for its secretary, whose objects are the collection of a Shakespeare library and the issuing of a "Shakespeare Annual," dedicated to the illustration of the poet and his works. Romanic France has at last caught the infection, and a Shakespeare Club for similar purposes is among the late institutions at Paris. One of its members has even ventured to widen the sphere of knowledge by presenting his countrymen with a volume entitled "Contemporains de Shakespeare, J. Webster et J. Ford," comprising translations of "The White Devil; or, Vittoria Corombrona," and the "Duchess of Malfy," by the former, and "The Broken Heart," by Ford. We have not met with the volume, but to see Charles Lamb's most favorite plays turned into French must be a curiosity. As might be expected, they prove to be rather too "strong meat" for the classical taste of the French critics, one of whom, in the "Revue Contemporaine," manifests an amusing disgust at the "chaos abominable" of murders, poisonings, stranglings, stabbings, etc., that fill, in deadly confusion, the scenes of Webster's gloomy tragedies. The same critic, however, intelligently notices the superiority of Ford in pathos and feeling, and singles out for commendation the concluding scene of "The Broken Heart," so familiar to all readers of Lamb's "Specimens."

—Another recent example of translation from the English must have been almost as difficult to execute as the conveying to Frenchmen a just idea of the Gothic grandeur of Webster and Ford, namely, Douglas Jerrold's "Mrs. Caudle's Curtain Lectures," which figure in the Paris book announcements as "Sous les Rideaux." In sheer bewilderment the critic speaks of it as a "livre humoristique" which must have merit or it would not have attracted a writer so spirituel as the translator, M. Albert Leroy. He describes it as consisting of "trente-six sermons" by "Madame Panade," without apparently penetrating their real significance. A writer far more likely to be appreciated in France is Anthony Trollope, whose simplicity, clearness, and general good taste in narration have much in common with the best French school of fiction. "La Ferme d'Orley" ("Orley Farm") accordingly occupies the place of honor in one of the leading literary journals.

—A French antiquarian, Mons. J. Berjeau, distinguished for his profound researches in typographical antiquities, has printed in London a work that fills a vacant niche in biography, "Catalogue Illustrée des Livres Xylographiques." It gives a full account, with collations and fac-similes, of the curious productions known as "Block Books," whose appearance in the fifteenth century heralded the advent of printing. These books are so called from the letterpress being, not printed from movable type, but cut on wooden blocks, in connection with the illustrations, in the precise manner used by the Chinese at the present day. About forty distinct works remain extant that were executed in this manner in Latin, German, Flemish, French, etc., but the different editions and varieties of impressions are very numerous, and form a battle-ground for disputants who engage in the long enduring contest about the invention of printing—when and where it was first practised—as the block books are indubitably the first stage in the progress of the infant art. No English block book is known. They are none of them dated, but most probably appeared between 1400 and 1450. The subjects of them are various, but they mostly relate to matters suitable for the instruction of the people, particularly the best known of them, the "Biblia Pauperum," or Bible for the Poor, a synopsis of Scripture history adapted to popular comprehension. A copy of this work was purchased by a New York amateur, celebrated for his Biblical collections, for £110 some years since, and we believe he has since procured other editions. Of many of the block books only one or two copies are known, and they must, from their mode of production, and the associations connected with them, always remain among the choicer ornaments of curious libraries. M. Berjeau's catalogue is limited to an edition of one hundred copies, twenty-five of which only are for public sale.

—Dr. Livingstone's new book of African travel, delayed in its appearance last spring in consequence of the time required for the preparation of the maps and illustrations, is now publishing in London by Murray, and may daily be expected to make its appearance from Messrs. Harpers' establishment. Its title is "The Zambesi and its Tributaries, and the Discovery of Lakes Shirwa and Nyassa, 1858–1864," by David and Charles Livingstone, the two brothers, of whom the latter is known to many among us as a former resident of the United States. Dr. Livingstone states that the chief object kept steadily in view in the work was to give as accurate an account as he was able of tracts of country previously unexplored, with their river systems, natural productions, and capabilities; and to bring before his countrymen and all interested in the cause of humanity the misery entailed by that curse of Africa, the slave trade, in its inland phases; a subject on which he and his companions are the first who have had any opportunities for forming a judgment. It is an honorable thing for the American book-trade that the republishers of Dr. Livingstone's book secure to the Doctor's family a per-centage on the sales equal to what any English publisher could fairly be expected to offer, and this although their edition of his first book was pirated and their profits interfered with by some irresponsible parties.

—Dr. William Smith's "Concise Dictionary of the Bible, for the use of Families and Students," is destined to meet with a sale in this country of immense extent. The bulk and expense of the original work, in three massive octavos, necessarily limited its use to professional men, and book-buyers who had both money and space at command. The results, however, of this great work are now condensed in one compact volume, where general readers and students will find all the necessary information for the elucidation and explanation of the Bible. Like the original work, the "Concise Dictionary of the Bible" is imported by Messrs. Little & Brown, of Boston, in quantities so large that they are enabled to offer copies of the English edition at the low price of six dollars, which, at the usual rates, would cost ten dollars and a half to procure from England by the single book.

—Some one has found out a use for large-paper books. The friends of Alfred B. Street, the poet, are getting up a testimonial edition of "Frontenac," his narrative poem, to be printed in quarto size, on the best paper, with large margin and new type, rubricated title, and a steel engraving of the author. Only three hundred copies will be issued, all to subscribers only. The prospectus of the work contains a sentence so naïve that it is impossible to avoid quoting it. "It is needless to speak of the merits of the poem itself; it having been published by the celebrated Bentley, of London, is a sufficient guarantee of its excellence, even were Mr. Street's position as a poet not fully recognized." Apparently there must be some confusion in the writer's mind between Dr. Bentley the great critic, and his namesake the publisher. At all events, he has never heard the very well-worn joke, according to which, when Mr. Bentley set up his magazine, he consulted James Smith about the title, saying he had determined at first to call it "The Wits' Miscellany," but on second thoughts preferred the name (afterwards adopted) of "Bentley's Miscellany." "Is not that going a little too far the other way?" said the wit.

—The new illustrated edition of "Legends and Lyrics," by the late Adelaide Anne Proctor, the "golden-tressed Adelaide" of her father's song, will be prepared with an introduction by Charles Dickens, his first appearance in the editorial capacity, appropriate in this instance because the earliest efforts of Miss Proctor's genius saw the light in "Household Words." The illustrations comprise a fine portrait of the author, and drawings by Millais, Keene, Dumourier, Tenniel, and other popular artists. It is published by Messrs. Bell & Daldy, of London.

THIS work is founded upon the manuscripts of Sir William Johnson, some seven thousand of which have been preserved, and is entitled, therefore, to the rank of an original contribution to American history. As such its place is an important one, for it tells the story of an important period, contains much information not to be found elsewhere, throws new light upon interesting questions, and corrects various errors, both of fact and of judgment, which could only be corrected by reference to original and authentic documents. Its subject was a very remarkable man, and, like all remarkable men, is best studied in his own letters.

Sir William Johnson was born at Warrentown, in the county of Down, Ireland, in 1715; came to America in 1738, as the land-agent of his uncle, Captain—afterwards Admiral—Sir Peter Warren, who had purchased a large estate in the valley of the Mohawk; began his fortune-making in a small country store; and died in 1774, a baronet of England, and, except the Penns, probably the largest landholder in the American colonies. We have only to call to mind what the valley of the Mohawk was in 1738 to see what a combination of energy, judgment, enterprise, and that good fortune which follows close upon the footsteps of skilful industry, was required to make it what it had become in 1774.

But Sir William Johnson was more than the accumulator of vast possessions. The times to which he belongs cover a period of great events, if not of great men; a period of two desolating wars—the old French war and the war of the conquest of Canada; and the period, also, of that gradual alienation of the colonies from the mother country which led to the War of Independence. The part which he performed during these eventful years required a force of character which is seldom combined with the power of adaptation, a watchful self-control which seems almost to exclude adventurous impulse, and a faith in Christian civilization which was often strangely at variance with the heathen and barbarian associations of his daily life. But without the power of adaptation he would never have obtained his unbounded control over the mind of the Indian; without adventurous impulse he would have shrunk from the hazards and excitements of the border; and without an abiding faith in Christianity and civilization he would not have been able to preserve that moral strength which, in despite of aberrations and shortcomings almost inseparable from his position, raised him so far above the greater part of those with whom he was brought into contact both as a public and as a private man.

It will be evident even from this hasty glance that his life is one of those which present peculiar attractions and peculiar difficulties to the biographer. As a public man, it becomes necessary to tell in it all that is required to be known of public events in order to make his part in them intelligible. As the life of a private man, it should contain such a detail of daily habits and pursuits, and such a view of moral and intellectual peculiarities, as to bring him before us as a being of the same feelings and passions with ourselves. The attractions are the individual characteristics of the man and the modes of their manifestation; the difficulties consist in preserving throughout the narrative such a subordination of incident to character as to prevent the reader from losing sight of the man in the events with which he was connected. It is upon this rock that so many biographers have been wrecked. The volumes before us, with all their merit, have not escaped it.

These volumes are the production of two men, having been begun by the father more than twenty years ago, and finished, as an act of filial piety, by the son within the last year. The first seven chapters were written by the former, the remaining thirty by the latter. In conception, therefore, the work belongs to the father; the greater part of the execution of it to the son. As the elder Mr. Stone conceived his subject, it required a union of the distinctive characteristics of annals, biography, and history; and hence his seven chapters contain a great deal that is new, and important, and interesting about the history of the Six Nations and the colonial history of New York. His son has followed faithfully in his footsteps, and the fluctuations of feeling among the savages, the contests between Governor Clinton and the New York Assembly, and the various expeditions for the subjugation of Canada, are related with much minuteness of detail, and not unfrequently with a correction, from original documents, of errors into which previous writers had fallen for the want of them. As a general history of the Indian relations of the period it possesses the value of a distinct and accurate narrative.

But here the inherent error of the plan appears. In this general history you lose sight of the individual whose name stands upon the title-page. It is not a biography of Sir William Johnson, but a history of events in many of which Sir William Johnson bore a part more or less prominent, while with many others he had no direct connection, and hardly even an indirect one. As a mediator between the white man and the Indian, he performed an important work, often averting dangers which no one else could have averted, and healing dissensions which no one else could have healed. But in all this he was the executor of the will of other men, looking to them for his instructions, and responsible to them for the fulfilment of them. The life of Washington is the history of the War of Independence, for his controlling influence was felt throughout the whole course of it. The Seven Years' War is a chapter in the life of Frederick, for, to whatever phase of it we turn, his eagle eye and cynic smile meet us in the foreground. And Michael Angelo so stamped his own mind upon the mind of his age that you can understand neither its sculpture, nor its painting, nor its architecture, nor even its poetry, without a record of the thoughts and acts of that informing spirit. But Sir William Johnson was neither the originator nor the controller of the great events of his time. The study of causes carries us to other men, and often far away from the banks of the Mohawk. His negotiations with the Six Nations hardly justify a narrative of the siege of Louisburg or the capture of Quebec, much less of the battle of the Great Meadows or the unfortunate attack upon Havanna. It is not to the biography of a subordinate, however remarkable, that we should naturally go for the history of his times.

We regret this mistake the more in the life of Sir William Johnson, inasmuch as his life affords abundant materials for a picturesque and animated narrative. His intercourse with the greatest of all the Indian confederacies was filled with scenes and incidents that address themselves to the imagination with all the force of romance. His influence over them was founded upon physical, intellectual, and moral superiority. He mingled in their sports, and they admired him for his feats of activity and strength. He sat with them in council, and they received his opinions with respect, and listened to his eloquence with conviction. He taught them that his word was a sacred pledge, and they told him, "We believe you, for you have never deceived us." His relations to them were so important in their consequences, so interesting in their nature, so remarkable for their duration, and so instructive as an illustration of the power of civilized man over his uncivilized brother, that we long for a closer view of him than Mr. Stone has given us—a view that will make us feel as if we had seen him with our own eyes and listened to him with our own ears. Freely as Mr. Stone has drawn from his documents, we regret that he has not drawn still more freely from those letters and diaries which evidently contain so much of the man and would seem to afford the materials for so picturesque and animated a narrative. Why look at so poetical a subject from so prosaic a point of view?

But accepting that point of view, Mr. Stone has executed his task diligently and well. The arrangement of the materials is sufficiently clear, and his narrative, though neither very animated nor very graceful, is never tedious nor dull. Here and there we have observed inelegances, and, still more frequently, those inequalities which mar the effect of description and narrative by bringing dissimilar styles into the same paragraph. Thus on pp. 479–480, vol. 1, after a plain and unadorned summary of the measures which brought on the war, we are told that "scarcely had its (the French fleet's) sails caught the ocean breezes when" the English started in pursuit. In the thirteenth chapter we find the story of the battle of the Great Meadows, a story so recently told by Bancroft and Irving that the repetition of it was hardly called for in a life of Sir William Johnson. Yet, although the narrative has more warmth, and is pitched in a somewhat higher key than many other parts of the work, it is hardly pitched high enough to bear so rhetorical a sentence as—"As soon as the genial rays of the sun had unlocked the icy chains which bound the Western streams, Colonel Washington set out from Alexandria with two companies, all that had been collected." Something above the usual tenor of the narrative might, perhaps, be looked for in the relation of Johnson's own campaign, but we must be allowed to question both the good taste and the literal accuracy of—"The wild flowers of the forest bent beneath the rude tread of armed men." As far as our own observation has extended, we should say that the effect of such a pressure upon wild flowers, as well as upon cultivated flowers, would be to crush rather than to bend them. We are told in a very calmly moving sentence on p. 520, that "many of the French in the vicinity of Fort Frederick bit the dust;" on p. 58, vol. 2, of "horrors which the pen shrinks from depicting;" on p. 68, that "the spectacle was full of life and animation, and withal very imposing;" on p. 130, "Thus before the foliage had put on the rich tints of autumn the reduction of Canada was complete;" on p. 179, that "Dalzell proceeded on his voyage and appeared like a beneficent Avatar before the eyes of the garrison."

Now, to some of these passages we have strong objections as forms of expression: "bit the dust," graphic as the dying man's biting may appear in Homer's ψυχρὸν δ' ἔλε χαλκὸν ὀδοῦσιν, is neither graphic nor accurate in modern war; and a pen that "shrinks," however horrible the story, is hardly a conceivable thing in these days of steel and gold with diamond points. But our chief objection to these passages is that they are not in keeping with the general style of the work, a style perfectly distinct, generally even, and never unpleasant, except when it offends your sense of harmony by a sentence for which nothing that precedes it had prepared you and which nothing that follows it supports.

We could have wished, also, a more accurate mode of reference. Smollet, Bancroft, and Graham are not sufficiently accurate indications of authorities. A very trifling increase of labor would have made verification easy by adding volume, page, and edition, and verification of references is a part of his duty which no careful reader of history will omit.

It has been a melancholy task to read this book; and it is a still more melancholy one to write about it. Perhaps since the day of Mr. Tupper's "Philosophy" there has been no more difficult reading of the poetic sort. It exhibits the effort of an essentially prosaic mind to lift itself, by a prolonged muscular strain, into poetry. Like hundreds of other good patriots, during the last four years, Mr. Walt Whitman has imagined that a certain amount of violent sympathy with the great deeds and sufferings of our soldiers, and of admiration for our national energy, together with a ready command of picturesque language, are sufficient inspiration for a poet. If this were the case, we had been a nation of poets. The constant developments of the war moved us continually to strong feeling and to strong expression of it. But in those cases in which these expressions were written out and printed with all due regard to prosody, they failed to make poetry, as any one may see by consulting now in cold blood the back volumes of the "Rebellion Record." Of course the city of Manhattan, as Mr. Whitman delights to call it, when regiments poured through it in the first months of the war, and its own sole god, to borrow the words of a real poet, ceased for a while to be the millionaire, was a noble spectacle, and a poetical statement to this effect is possible. Of course the tumult of a battle is grand, the results of a battle tragic, and the untimely deaths of young men a theme for elegies. But he is not a poet who merely reiterates these plain facts ore rotundo. He only sings them worthily who views them from a height. Every tragic event collects about it a number of persons who delight to dwell upon its superficial points—of minds which are bullied by the accidents of the affair. The temper of such minds seems to us to be the reverse of the poetic temper; for the poet, although he incidentally masters, grasps, and uses the superficial traits of his theme, is really a poet only in so far as he extracts its latent meaning and holds it up to common eyes. And yet from such minds most of our war-verses have come, and Mr. Whitman's utterances, much as the assertion may surprise his friends, are in this respect no exception to general fashion. They are an exception, however, in that they openly pretend to be something better; and this it is that makes them melancholy reading. Mr. Whitman is very fond of blowing his own trumpet, and he has made very explicit claims for his book. "Shut not your doors," he exclaims at the outset—

> "Shut not your doors to me, proud libraries,
> For that which was lacking among you all, yet needed most, I bring;
> A book I have made for your dear sake, O soldiers,
> And for you, O soul of man, and you, love of comrades;
> The words of my book nothing, the life of it everything;
> A book separate, not link'd with the rest, nor felt by the intellect;
> But you will feel every word, O Libertad! arm'd Libertad!
> It shall pass by the intellect to swim the sea, the air,
> With joy with you, O soul of man."

These are great pretensions, but it seems to us that the following are even greater:

> "From Paumanok starting, I fly like a bird,
> Around and around to soar, to sing the idea of all;
> To the north betaking myself, to sing there arctic songs,
> To Kanada, 'till I absorb Kanada in myself—to Michigan then,
> To Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, to sing their songs (they are inimitable);
> Then to Ohio and Indiana, to sing theirs—to Missouri and Kansas and Arkansas to sing theirs,
> To Tennessee and Kentucky—to the Carolinas and Georgia, to sing theirs,
> To Texas, and so along up toward California, to roam accepted everywhere;
> To sing first (to the tap of the war-drum, if need be)
> The idea of all—of the western world, one and inseparable,
> And then the song of each member of these States."

Mr. Whitman's primary purpose is to celebrate the greatness of our armies; his secondary purpose is to celebrate the greatness of the city of New York. He pursues these objects through a hundred pages of matter which remind us irresistibly of the story of the college professor who, on a venturesome youth's bringing him a theme done in blank verse, reminded him that it was not customary in writing prose to begin each line with a capital. The frequent capitals are the only marks of verse in Mr. Whitman's writing. There is, fortunately, but one attempt at rhyme. We say fortunately, for if the inequality of Mr. Whitman's lines were self-registering, as it would be in the case of an anticipated syllable at their close, the effect would be painful in the extreme. As the case stands, each line starts off by itself, in resolute independence of its companions, without a visible goal. But if Mr. Whitman does not write verse, he does not write ordinary prose. The reader has seen that liberty is "libertad." In like manner, comrade is "camerado;" Americans are "Americanos;" a pavement is a "trottoir," and Mr. Whitman himself is a "chansonnier." If there is one thing that Mr. Whitman is not, it is this, for Béranger was a chansonnier. To appreciate the force of our conjunction, the reader should compare his military lyrics with Mr. Whitman's declamations. Our author's novelty, however, is not in his words, but in the form of his writing. As we have said, it begins for all the world like verse and turns out to be arrant prose. It is more like Mr. Tupper's proverbs than anything we have met. But what if, in form, it is prose? it may be asked. Very good poetry has come out of prose before this. To this we would reply that it must first have gone into it. Prose, in order to be good poetry, must first be good prose. As a general principle, we know of no circumstance more likely to impugn a writer's earnestness than the adoption of an anomalous style. He must have something very original to say if none of the old vehicles will carry his thoughts. Of course he may be surprisingly original. Still, presumption is against him. If on examination the matter of his discourse proves very valuable, it justifies, or at any rate excuses, his literary innovation.

But if, on the other hand, it is of a common quality, with nothing new about it but its manners, the public will judge the writer harshly. The most that can be said of Mr. Whitman's vaticinations is, that, cast in a fluent and familiar manner, the average substance of them might escape unchallenged. But we have seen that Mr. Whitman prides himself especially on the substance—the life—of his poetry. It may be rough, it may be grim, it may be clumsy—such we take to be the author's argument—but it is sincere, it is sublime, it appeals to the soul of man, it is the voice of a people. He tells us, in the lines quoted, that the words of his book are nothing. To our perception they are everything, and very little at that. A great deal of verse that is nothing but words has, during the war, been sympathetically sighed over and cut out of newspaper corners, because it has possessed a certain simple melody. But Mr. Whitman's verse, we are confident, would have failed even of this triumph, for the simple reason that no triumph, however small, is won but through the exercise of art, and that this volume is an offense against art. It is not enough to be grim and rough and careless; common sense is also necessary, for it is by common sense that we are judged. There exists in even the commonest minds, in literary matters, a certain precise instinct of conservatism, which is very shrewd in detecting wanton eccentricities. To this instinct Mr. Whitman's attitude seems monstrous. It is monstrous because it pretends to persuade the soul while it slights the intellect; because it pretends to gratify the feelings while it outrages the taste. The point is that it does this on theory, wilfully, consciously, arrogantly. It is the little nursery game of "open your mouth and shut your eyes." Our hearts are often touched through a compromise with the artistic sense, but never in direct violation of it. Mr. Whitman sits down at the outset and counts out the intelligence. This were indeed a wise precaution on his part if the intelligence were only submissive! But when she is deliberately insulted, she takes her revenge by simply standing erect and open-eyed. This is assuredly the best she can do. And if she could find a voice she would probably address Mr. Whitman as follows: "You came to woo my sister, the human soul. Instead of giving me a kick as you approach, you should either greet me courteously, or, at least, steal in unobserved. But now you have me on your hands. Your chances are poor. What the human heart desires above all is sincerity, and you do not appear to me sincere. For a lover you talk entirely too much about yourself. In one place you threaten to absorb Kanada. In another you call upon the city of New York to incarnate you, as you have incarnated it. In another you inform us that neither youth pertains to you nor 'delicatesse,' that you are awkward in the parlor, that you do not dance, and that you have neither bearing, beauty, knowledge, nor fortune. In another place, by an allusion to your 'little songs,' you seem to identify yourself with the third person of the Trinity. For a poet who claims to sing 'the idea of all,' this is tolerably egotistical. We look in vain, however, through your book for a single idea. We find nothing but flashy imitations of ideas. We find a medley of extravagances and commonplaces. We find art, measure, grace, sense sneered at on every page, and nothing positive given us in their stead. To be positive one must have something to say; to be positive requires reason, labor, and art; and art requires, above all things, a suppression of one's self, a subordination of one's self to an idea. This will never do for you, whose plan is to adapt the scheme of the universe to your own limitations. You cannot entertain and exhibit ideas; but, as we have seen, you are prepared to incarnate them. It is for this reason, doubtless, that when once you have planted yourself squarely before the public, and in view of the great service you have done to the ideal, have become, as you say, 'accepted everywhere,' you can afford to deal exclusively in words. What would be bald nonsense and dreary platitudes in any one else becomes sublimity in you. But all this is a mistake. To become adopted as a national poet, it is not enough to discard everything in particular and to accept everything in general, to amass crudity upon crudity, to discharge the undigested contents of your blotting-book into the lap of the public. You must respect the public which you address; for it has taste, if you have not. It delights in the grand, the heroic, and the masculine; but it delights to see these conceptions cast into worthy form. It is indifferent to brute sublimity. It will never do for you to thrust your hands into your pockets and cry out that, as the research of form is an intolerable bore, the shortest and most economical way for the public to embrace its idols—for the nation to realize its genius—is in your own person. This democratic, liberty-loving, American populace, this stern and war-tried people, is a great civilizer. It is devoted to refinement. If it has sustained a monstrous war, and practised human nature's best in so many ways for the last five years, it is not to put up with spurious poetry afterwards. To sing aright our battles and our glories it is not enough to have served in a hospital (however praiseworthy the task in itself), to be aggressively careless, inelegant, and ignorant, and to be constantly preoccupied with yourself. It is not enough to be rude, lugubrious, and grim. You must also be serious. You must forget yourself in your ideas. Your personal qualities—the vigor of your temperament, the manly independence of your nature, the tenderness of your heart—these facts are impertinent. You must be possessed, and you must strive to possess your possession. If in your striving you break into divine eloquence, then you are a poet. If the idea which possesses you is the idea of your country's greatness, then you are a national poet; and not otherwise."

McCOSH ON INTUITIONS.*

THE philosophical and religious writings of Dr. McCosh have already secured for him a prominent position among living thinkers, and considerable influence both in Great Britain and America. The present work exhibits so much ability, good sense, and philosophical acumen that it will doubtless increase his reputation and prove him a worthy successor of the distinguished metaphysicians who have rendered his native land famous in the contests of philosophy. Though in many respects original, professing to follow no school, and in reality independent in its spirit of all authority but that of the religious truths in behalf of which it is written, this work is nevertheless substantially a development from the Scottish school. The author regards in the same light with this school the range and province of metaphysical enquiry, and treats the doctrines of all other schools in the same spirit. He finds in the writings of Reid and Stewart, it is true, statements which would logically "land us in very serious consequences," but with the essence of their doctrines, and especially with the natural realism of Sir William Hamilton, he strongly sympathizes, though he goes somewhat beyond Hamilton in his theory of immediate consciousness.

His principal problem appears to have been to discover a theory of consciousness which shall assure us of as much as possible without carrying our assent over into the extremes to which the statements of philosophers are too often logically liable. A theory which shall assure us of the reality and permanence of the external world without leading us into materialism, or into a belief in the absolute permanence of matter; which shall assure us of the reality of cause and effect and the existence of power in the world without carrying our assent over to the "dismal consequences" to which Kant's analysis of causation appears to lead; a theory which shall guarantee us a knowledge of substance or substantive reality, without upsetting our personality and landing us in pantheism; and a theory which, at the same time, shall be free from the psychological objections which, since the time of Locke, have been urged against certain forms of the doctrine of intuitive universal truths.

A fundamental principle of Dr. McCosh's system is that the mind always begins with the concrete, the singular, and the individual in its acquisition of knowledge, and arrives at universal truths—not, indeed, as the results of a process, but in the course of a process, in which the elements of universal judgments must be produced by particular experiences and special judgments. These particulars are, however, of such a nature that they warrant the universal judgment, not by the cumulative force of experience, but by the inherent force of each particular conviction, which comes from a power in the mind, and only awaits the formation of the proper formula by generalization in order to pronounce a decision of a universal character.

The author thus avoids the objections which have been so often urged against the doctrine of innate ideas. Universal judgments exist, he thinks, in the mind originally only as laws of our mental faculties, determining them to "look for" certain facts which are really universal, but are only discovered in individual cases; and the individual decisions carry in them the truth of the universal.

Having thus defined intuitive knowledge, our author proceeds to show how such knowledge can be distinguished from other kinds, and he lays down the tests which the philosophy of common sense has prescribed in the writings of the Scottish school, the tests, namely, of self-evidence, necessity, and catholicity or universality in human beliefs. He divides the cognitive acts of the mind into three species, and adopts as the generic name for them the theological term "convictions." There are the cognitive convictions, which decide immediately that an object exists, not only in relation to our faculties, but independently of them. By our cognitions we know, through sense-perception and self-consciousness, that something in particular exists, has existed, and will continue to exist. In other words, that something has present existence and present permanence. Such cognitions also decide immediately that the thing exists in space or is extended; also that it has power, or is a cause and will produce an effect. All this the intuitive powers of cognition anticipate by their innate nature, and they "look for" and discover all this in special experiences.

Such intuitions precede, both logically and chronologically, all other "convictions." In this the author dissents from Hamilton's doctrine, which supposes a faculty of faith to underlie all our cognitive acts. "Intuitive beliefs" form with him a derived class of "convictions"—not derived from our cognitions logically, but from them as furnishing the materials on which a new class of intuitive powers are brought to bear. Our faith-intuitions have no real objects presented to them. "I hold," says the author, "that knowledge, psychologically considered, appears first, and then faith. But around our original cognitions there grows and clusters a body of primitive beliefs, which goes far beyond our personal knowledge." Again he says, "Faith collects round our observational knowledge and even around the conclusions reached by inference." His examples of primitive faiths are our beliefs in the infinity of time and space, and in infinity as an attribute of the nature of the Deity. They are "beliefs gathering round space, time, and the infinite."

The third class of primitive convictions are called "primitive judgments," and have for their objects the relations of the things with which our cognitions are conversant; and they arise from a power in the mind to anticipate, to the extent of looking for, certain necessary relations among objects, such as their necessary relations in space and time, the facts, for example, that the straight line is the shortest distance between two points, and that two straight lines cannot enclose a space, and the like.

Such are the author's analysis and description of our primitive convictions, the tests of which are, first, their self-evidence; secondly, and dependent on this, their necessity; and thirdly, their catholicity. Self-evidence is the fact that the conviction exists in our own minds and exists independently of any other facts. Necessity of belief or the irresistible character of the conviction follows, according to the author, from this self-evidence. "I would not," he says, "ground the evidence on the necessity of belief, but I would ascribe the irresistible nature of the conviction to the self-evidence. As the necessity flows from the self-evidence, so it may become a test of it, and a test not difficult of application." Catholicity is also a derivative test, and, "when conjoined with necessity, may determine very readily and precisely whether a conviction be intuitive;" but all these tests "apply directly only to individual convictions. To the generalized expression of them the tests apply only mediately, and on the supposition and condition that the formulæ are the proper expression of the spontaneous perceptions." Originally these convictions are laws of the perceptive faculties guiding their action, though not determining their objects. Their objects are really discovered, and the conviction is primarily held, only in respect to particular perceptions or judgments. Generalizations are then made, but they are generalizations "of convictions in our own minds, each of which carries necessity in it." There are, therefore, according to the author, two fundamentally distinct kinds of generalization, and in this respect his doctrine is quite original. Laws or general facts may be derived from an experience, necessarily limited, of facts which are either inferences more or less perfectly drawn from intuitive perceptions, or else facts at which no power of the mind "looks" intuitively, but which find their way into the mind by the force of repeated experiences. These are laws which say nothing about the possible; they only testify of the actual. But the laws which are immediate generalizations from intuitive perceptions and judgments "are of a higher and deeper nature; they are generalizations of convictions carrying necessity with them, and a consequent universality in their very nature."

This is briefly our author's system, which he proceeds to apply to the various problems of metaphysics, such as the reality of cause and substance, and the self, and the external world. In ingenuity this theory appears to us to exceed anything which has come from the Scottish school, and in pliancy it exceeds, we think, any system which has ever been propounded. The extremes of philosophy are avoided by it with surprising agility. If any proposition be laid down as universally true from which logical consequences of a heterodox character are deducible, this system affords the means of modifying the proposition without impairing in any measure the evidence of its universality, since the infallible powers do not testify to the truth of any formula immediately, but only in so far as the formula represents the particular decisions of the mind. If, on the other hand, the "sceptic" calls in question the universality of any truth on the ground that the mind is cognizant only of the particular, or doubts the necessity of a belief on the ground that all experience is of the contingent, our author admits his grounds but denies that his conclusions follow, since universality and necessity do not come from the particulars of contingent experience as such, but from the powers of the mind looking through these into reality, and deciding absolutely only in regard to the particulars.

It is to be regretted, however, that the author does not give us a more explicit account of what he means by such expressions as "primitive particular convictions carrying necessity with them, and a consequent universality in their very nature." In all the definitions of necessity with which we are acquainted, we have nowhere found it extended beyond the facts and the logical consequences of the facts in which it is supposed to exist primitively. That the universal does not follow logically from the particular or from any number of particulars, is what the author strenuously maintains. How, then, do the particulars carry in them the necessity of the universal? for this is what we understand the author's expressions to mean. How unless it be that the particulars are known simply as instances of the universal, the truth of which we possess as an independent knowledge? But such an independent knowledge of the universal the author as strenuously denies. The universal comes to consciousness, he thinks, only through the particulars, yet not by the way of suggestion or an awakening of a dormant truth, but rather as a fact which the particular contains in itself. It is not, according to the author, from the objects of intuition on one hand, nor from the powers of intuition on the other, that the truth of a universal proposition becomes known. This is obtained by the generalization of particular decisions of the mind. In the general maxim the mind re-cognizes what it has previously cognized in each and every one of the particular cases. The underived necessity of the particular conviction is somehow translated into the universal truth of the general maxim.

The author probably attaches to the word "necessity" a peculiar sense, as something more than mere cogency of belief, though he nowhere defines it in any other signification. There is a real and important logical distinction involved in this word, which renders the author's theory intelligible enough, though quite a different doctrine from what he intends to set forth. There is a distinction in the logical use of the word necessity, as opposed to contingency, which relates not to the cogency of the belief with which a fact is held, but to the connection of the fact itself with other facts in our experience. When we say that "anything must be or must be so and so," we mean to express something different from the statement that "this thing is or is so and so;" yet this difference does not refer to the originality, simplicity, or cogency of our belief in the statement. The copulas must be and cannot be involve in them universal propositions, though they connect only individual or particular terms. They mean that the truth they predicate is unconditional—is independent of any other facts; that there exists nothing to prevent the thing from being, or being so and so; or that the particular fact does not depend on any conditions which we can suppose from the evidence of experience to be variable. From the particular proposition, "These two straight lines cannot enclose a space," may be deduced, through the universality implied in the copula, the universal proposition, "No two straight lines can enclose a space." For "cannot" here means that there are no conditions, or supposable variations of conditions, which will make a closed figure of these two lines. But the evidence on which such a fact rests will be equally good for any other two straight lines, since a change from these to another pair will not affect the conditions on which the truth of the particular case depends. Hence, "no pair of straight lines can enclose a space." This follows from the unconditionalness of a particular fact—not from the cogency of our belief in it. This cogency is quite another affair.

By overlooking the universal, which is implied in an unconditional, particular proposition, our author has sought for the origin of the corresponding explicit universal in the character of our particular convictions as mental acts; whereas this character of universality really depends on the relations of particular facts to our experiences generally. We, therefore, come back to the difficulty, still unsolved, as to how we derive universality from a limited experience. Upon this Dr. McCosh lays down the usual dictum of his school. He says that "a very wide and uniform experience would justify a general expectation but not a necessary conviction; and this experience is liable to be disturbed at any time by a new occurrence inconsistent with what has been previously known to us." But whence this liability? On what evidence is it supposed? Are we informed of it by an intuition or by experience? If by the former, then we have intuitions about other generalizations than universal ones, which is contrary to our author's theory. If by the latter, then our experience is not uniform, which is contrary to his special hypothesis. As he, therefore, shuts himself off from both these sources of information on the subject, we are left no alternative but to conclude that his statement about the liability of our uniform experiences to be disturbed is wholly gratuitous and a begging of the question. Or perhaps he means that propositions which we do not feel obliged to believe, though not contradicted in our experience, should yet, from their analogy with others which are occasionally contradicted, be regarded as liable to exception. But again we demand, Whence is the force of this analogy? What right have we to draw such a conclusion? Is it not also a virtual begging of the question? For, suppose it true, what the opposite school of philosophy teaches, that there exist certain universal facts, not born into the mind either as innate ideas or as laws of its faculties, but existing as the universal circumstances into which the mind is born. There could be no exceptions to the uniformity of our experience of such facts, even if there were no necessity in our convictions of them; and although, as our author's school believes, we always do have necessary convictions of such facts and of no others, the doctrine must rest, after all, on the evidence of induction—on the observation that the mark of necessity always does attend uncontradicted truths and no others. But the history of science as well as the discussions of philosophy contradict this induction. "There was a time," says Mr. Mill, "when men of the most cultivated intellects and the most emancipated from the dominion of early prejudice, would not credit the existence of antipodes." Our author, after quoting this example, observes: "I acknowledge that the tests of intuition have often been loosely stated, and that they have also been illegitimately applied, just as the laws of derivative logic have been. But they have seldom or never been put in the ambiguous form in which Mr. Mill understands them, and it is only in such a shape that they could ever be supposed to cover such beliefs as the rejection of the rotundity of the earth. . . . It is not the power of conception, in the sense either of phantasm or notion, that should be used as a test, but it is self-evidence with necessity." He then proceeds to understate the facts of the case thus: "There was a time when even educated men felt a difficulty in conceiving the antipodes, because it seemed contrary not to intuition but to their limited experience; but surely no one knowing anything of philosophy or of what he was speaking would have maintained, at any time, that it was self-evident that the earth could not be round." On this we have to observe, in the first place, that the difficulty of conceiving the antipodes was not, as the author appears to think, a difficulty of conceiving the rotundity of the earth, but a difficulty of conceiving men standing on the opposite side of the round earth, without having their feet stuck on, like flies to a ceiling, and this difficulty was such that these philosophers could not be made to credit its possibility; in other words, they had one of Dr. McCosh's intuitions on the matter. Mr. Herbert Spencer, who follows the Scottish school in positing belief as a valid and ultimate test of the truths of universals, attempts to explain away this historical example by limiting the test to what is simple and "undecomposable," and he supposes the conception of the antipodes to have been difficult or impossible to the ancients, and the fact to have been incredible, on account of the complexity of the conception. But we suspect the case to have been just the reverse of this. The antipodes were incredible to the ancients because they conceived the fact as a simple and unconditional one, and in contradiction of the equally simple and unconditional fact of their own standing on the earth. And it is because we in modern times are able to resolve both facts into the conditions on which they depend that they are seen not to be contradictory. So long as "down" was conceived as an absolute direction in the universe, dependent on nothing but its own nature, so long were the antipodes incredible and stood in contradiction of as simple, original, and necessary a belief as "that two straight lines cannot enclose a space." In short, the ancients had in this case all the tests which the Scottish school apply as ultimate in the ascertainment of truth.

But what can be more ultimate? What other tests are there? this school demands. Perhaps there are no tests of a general character, or of simple and easy application; but, without awaiting an answer, this school describes all those who oppose them as "sceptics," deniers of truth; whereas what the so-called "sceptics," "idealists," and "sensationalists" deny is only the validity of these tests as ultimate ones. What nobody doubts or calls in question, that, of course, nobody wants a test for, though it may be a useful and instructive exercise in philosophy to generalize the conditions of ultimate credibility. But such conditions are illegitimately used as an appeal from the doubts or questions of philosophy. The Scottish school, half aware of this, commonly describes the opinions and doubts from which they appeal to intuition and common sense as either insincere or as positively wicked, and our author, in particular, regards all the errors and mistakes of philosophers as coming from a perverse will, from their not yielding to their intuitive, heaven-born convictions. He describes his opponents as "opponents of intuitive truth," whereas they only oppose the theory which regards our simplest and most certain convictions as derived from a different source from that which assures us of all else that we know, namely, our experience of the world and of our own thoughts. The "sceptic" does not deny that our knowledges are produced according to laws which may be discovered in them by comparison and generalization, and his doubts and questions about metaphysical truths, such as the relation of cause and effect and the existence of the external world, are doubts and questions, not about the reality of these knowledges, but about the kind of reality they have, and this must be determined, he thinks, by the nature of the evidence on which they rest.

The "sceptic" does not deny that many of his beliefs are unconditional or necessary. He only denies that this quality is a proof of their simplicity or originality, and on this account he doubtless holds to them somewhat less wilfully. By necessity he means unconditionalness, or that the fact is independent of all other known facts and conditions. Whatever the word necessity means more than this, comes, he thinks, from a rhetorical fervor of assertion; as if one should say, "This must be so," meaning that he is determined that it shall be so. This sort of self-determination in their convictions the Scottish school doubtless have, and they are probably correct in not ascribing it to the evidence of experience; but then they are wrong in thinking that it comes from the reason, since, in fact, its real origin is in the will.

The appeal from the "sceptic's" questions to common sense is inept in two important particulars. In the first place, the appeal is an ignoratio elenchi, for the questions are not questions of facts but questions of their philosophical explanations; questions of the origin and nature of the facts as knowledges. These have nothing to do with the cogency or simplicity of our beliefs, except to explain them. When the "sceptic" asks why some beliefs are so much more cogent than others, he is accused by this school of doubting whether they really are so, and he is referred for an explanation to the very facts which he seeks to explain. But, in the second place, no discussion is legitimate which appeals to an oracle not acknowledged by both parties. The proper appeal in all disputes is to common principles explicitly announced and understood in the same sense by both disputants. It is common, indeed, in physical investigations to speak of an appeal to experiment or to observation; still, by this is meant, not an appeal from anybody's decision or opinion, but from everybody's ignorance of the facts of the case. The facts in philosophy are so notorious that this sort of appeal is not required. What is sought by the so-called "sceptic" is the nature of the fact, its explanation; and he is not deterred from the enquiry by the seeming simplicity of the fact, but proceeds, like the astronomer, and the physicist, and the naturalist, by framing and verifying hypotheses to reduce the simple seeming to its simpler reality. In this the idealist does not deny that there is an existence properly enough called the external world, but he wishes to ascertain the nature of this reality by studying what the notion of externality really implies; what are the circumstances attending its rise in our thoughts, and its probable growth in our experience. In this research he does not forget that all explanation ultimately rests on the inexplicable; that "there is no appeal from our faculties generally;" he only denies that the present simplicity of a fact in our thoughts is a test of its primitive simplicity in the growth of the mind. For such a test would have deterred the astronomer from questioning the Ptolemaic system and the stability of the earth, or the physicist from calling in question nature's abhorrence of a vacuum.

The oracular deliverances of consciousness, even when consulted by the most approved maxims of interrogation, cannot present a fact in the isolated, untheoretical form which criticism and scientific investigation demand. Philosophers are not the only theorizers. The vulgar, and the philosopher himself as one of them, have certain theoretical prepossessions, natural explanations and classifications of the phenomena which are habitually brought to their notice—such as the apparent movements of the heavens, and the axioms of hourly experience. How are these natural theories to be eliminated? How unless by criticism—by just such criticisms as those of the great "sceptic" Hume? But while the criticisms of Hume awoke the philosopher of Königsberg from his "dogmatic slumber," and gave rise to the greatest philosophical movement of modern times, it appeared to affect the "sceptic's" own countrymen only to plunge them into a profound dogmatic coma. The "sceptic" seemed to these philosophers to deny truth itself, and to demand a proof for everything. "There are truths," says our author, "above probation, but there are none above examination, and the truths above proof are those which bear inspection the best." This is the key to the whole Scottish method. The inspection of truths as to their credibility seems to these thinkers to be the chief business of philosophy. As if truths were on trial for their lives! As if the "sceptic" desired worse of them than their better acquaintance!

An appeal to an oracle silences but does not settle disputes. Principles to start from must be those for which no explanation is supposable. The existence of undisputed and indisputable facts is denied by no philosopher, and every true philosopher seeks for such facts; the "idealists" and the "sensationalists" as well as the rest. But idealism was ever a stumbling-block to the Scottish school, so much so that their intuitions seem to spring directly from an innate inability in the thinkers of that nation to understand this doctrine. They appear unable to distinguish between questions concerning the origin of an idea and a doubt of its reality. It is much as if a Ptolemaic astronomer should accuse a Copernican of denying or ignoring the visible changes in the aspects of the heavens.

The "sceptic" does not doubt peremptorily, but always for cause. He does profess to doubt realities or principles, but only whether certain truths are principles or simple cognitions, and whether they are cognitions having the kind of reality they are vulgarly supposed to have. There would be a sort of grim humor in our author's discussion of "what are we to do to the sceptic?" and what we should and what we should not do for him, were it not that the discussion is too obviously a serious one. The author does not see that what we ought to do is to try to understand the "sceptic," and what we ought not to do is to misrepresent him.

"Precipitate and incorrect as Hume's conclusion was" concerning the possibility of a science of metaphysics, "yet," says Kant, "it was at least founded on investigation, and this investigation was well worthy that all the best intellects of his time should have united successfully to solve the problem, and, if possible, in the temper in which he proposed it, for from this a total reform of the science must soon have arisen. Only the unpropitious fate of his metaphysic would have it that it should be understood by none. One cannot without a certain feeling of pain see how utterly his adversaries, Reid, Oswald, Beattie, and later Priestley also, missed the point of his problem. By continually taking for granted just what he doubted, but on the other hand proving with vehemence, and, what is more, with great indecorum, what it never came into his head to doubt, they so mistook his hint towards improvement that everything remained in the old state, as though nothing had happened."—[Prolegomena to every Future Metaphysic which can be put forth as a science. Introduction.]

We will only add that our author has not improved upon his predecessors.

GIFTS PLUS TAXES.*

So far as the object of this work may be learned from its title-page, the pains bestowed might almost seem superfluous. Neither munificence, self-sacrifice, nor patriotism can be denied a people which contributed men by the million and money by the thousand million to maintain the national integrity, in cheerful response to the call of its appointed magistrates. The books of the recruiting-officer and the tax-gatherer would alone refute the charge of sordidness or of a shameful attachment to life. That the country was saved without a single refusal of what was demanded by Government, and without a regret for the cost of safety, is a notorious and sufficient tribute to the American character. The volume before us has another story to tell. It treats not of the army in the field, but of what it rightly calls "the army in reserve"—not of imposts, but of free-will offerings. It traces the history of seventy millions of dollars, a fairly-estimated portion of the never-to-be-known amount which measured the sympathy of those who stayed at home for those who went to the battle.

The record opens with a brief chapter on the private liberality of our Revolutionary grandfathers and grandmothers, and their many personal sacrifices to the struggling cause of independence. Then follows the account of the rise and development of that vast system of co-operation by which, after Sumter fell, the authorities were relieved and supported, and the loyal ranks supplied and cared for, so long as a rebel host remained to dispute the Federal supremacy. It was impossible that the Sanitary Commission should not occupy the chief attention of the historian, since this was the largest and best of the benevolent organizations of the war, and was the most thoroughly popular of all. It satisfied, too, the natural cravings of the friends and kindred of the soldiers to mitigate their hardships, to provide them with comforts, to cheer their spirits with the evidence that they were not forgotten, and to shield them from all the perils to which they were exposed, save those from the enemy himself. When the record deals with recruiting-committees and funds for the families of volunteers, or any undertaking which required subscriptions in money, of course it is the men who are prominent. But the glory of the Sanitary Commission is, as its farewell address acknowledged so gratefully, that its thousand branches were managed, and its most successful schemes for raising means devised and carried out, by the women of the land. Here belong the statistics of those unprecedented fairs which were resorted to when the surplus material for soldiers' clothing had been exhausted, and money was needed to buy the stuff which should keep the hitherto busy fingers still at work. In these extraordinary as well as in their every-day exertions, both spontaneous and both without other than spiritual remuneration, the women were scarcely more admirable for their devotion than for their business energy and practical efficiency. Their achievements make a readable, almost romantic tale, and lighten the long lists of donors and committees which occupy so many pages of the compilation. But they were not alone in filling the treasury of the Commission. Not a day passed, says the record, "without some performance, professional, social, or amateur, some exhibition, some festival, some lecture," of which the proceeds were an offering to the welfare of the soldier. And there were fresher contrivances than fairs for easing the pockets of the community, when it would have shrunk from downright giving. Such was the auction in which every man was a bidder, the majority purchasers, and no man an owner after all! This pleasantry originated in Nevada Territory with a sack of flour which had been the subject of an election wager, and which was sold and re-sold and sold again, travelling hither and yonder on the Pacific coast—sometimes even being simultaneously bid for in two places remote from each other—until it had netted $63,000 in gold, three blocks of lots valued at $7,000, and a house and lot, not to mention a few thousands in legal tenders after it had left the mining States. For a complete and careful history of the Commission, the public must, of course, look to a special work commensurate with the magnitude of its subject. Such a one, we understand, is in preparation by Mr. C. J. Stillé, of Philadelphia.

Other instrumentalities are described more briefly: the Christian Commission, the Cooper-Shop Refreshment Saloon, the various Freedmen's Commissions, the Fund for East Tennessee, etc. The money contributed to the relief of Savannah, after the Federal occupation of that city, is also noted, together with the international charity of the George Griswold. Scarcely any form of patriotism or liberality is omitted. We are told how the crops were gathered by wives, mothers, daughters, and sisters, where the men had gone, before the grain was ripe, to another harvest from which they might not bring their sickles back. In a little Connecticut village which had raised a fund to promote enlistments, and another to succor the families of the volunteers, the doctor refused pay for his services, the parson forgot the pew-rent when it fell due, and the undertaker's bill was never seen unreceipted. The school teachers of a city conspicuous for its educational institutions relinquished a fixed percentage of their salary during the war. The pilots of this fair harbor made no charge for guiding Government vessels. The costly gifts to our great commanders are put to the general account, which is further swelled by such items as the undrawn salary of Solicitor-General Whiting, the donation of the steamer Vanderbilt by him whose name it bore, and the scholarship endowed by General Butler in Phillips Academy for a soldier's son.

To give some idea of the chief component parts of the seventy millions already alluded to, we present the following estimates from the summary: Contributions of the Eastern and Atlantic States, for enlistments and the relief of drafted men, $15,000,000; Western and Central do., $13,000,000; in aid of soldiers' families, from both sections, $4,500,000; cash and supplies through the regular channel of the Sanitary Commission, $12,971,000; for similar purposes through other channels, $6,000,000; Western Sanitary Commission, $4,000,000; Christian Commission, $4,530,000.

Mr. Goodrich must be allowed to have done his part in a very creditable manner, and to have preserved the "Tribute-Book" from the fate of other similar publications, which vainly hope that their elegant attire will outbalance the mortal dulness of their text. The "Tribute-Book" may be read with pleasure well-nigh from beginning to end, and may rely on being appreciated by the generations which are to come, perhaps quite as much as by the present. The publishers, on their side, have manifestly striven to do their very best, and, so far as paper, type, and binding are concerned, have produced a very rare and unexceptionable volume—not a whit too costly for its precious contents. Of the engravings our praise must be qualified. As a whole, they are poorly printed, and are not remarkable as designs. A part of Mr. Nast's possess the merits of his best, but the frontispiece is inexpressibly cheap and commonplace. Mr. Hoppin's humor appears to advantage in one or two borders. Mr. Fenn's landscapes are the most satisfactory of all the illustrations; for Mr. Hennessy's single drawing is too much marred between the engraver and the printer to be ranked as the very first.

THE SIXTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION OF THE ARTISTS' FUND SOCIETY OF NEW YORK.

I.

The galleries of the National Academy of Design look better this fall than they did last spring. The walls against which the pictures are hung were stained then a shade nearly approaching to the color of oiled white oak. It was harsh and raw, and did not set off the pictures well. During the summer the authorities have taken thought: the walls behind the pictures are now colored a sort of drab, a soft tint which does not attract the eye. This is as it should be. The walls of a private gallery, where pictures are less crowded together, where each has (or should have) a certain breadth of wall space above it, below it, and on either side, may be darker and richer in color; even a deep maroon flock paper, or, as Mr. Hamerton has it, "pomegranate-colored velvet," will suit them. But in these public galleries, where pictures are of necessity closely set, frame to frame, and where each picture more than usually cared for has its own "shadow-box" lined with the color the artist prefers as a foil to his work, we think it is right to keep the walls as little obtrusive as possible; tint them a neutral color that no one will notice, and so do no harm (if no good) to the pictures. The band of dark red below the oaken moulding that marks "the line," echoed by the narrower band of the same color between the two mouldings high above the pictures, helps the general effect of the room. But we shall never be satisfied with these galleries until there is a great deal of varied color high up about the skylights and in the coved ceilings above the picture-walls. The high wall above the arches of the corridor especially needs color-decoration.

The building, indeed, is not finished inside, as yet. It is a trial to any one who cares for beautiful architecture to go up the great staircase and see the capitals of the arcade, all but one still uncarved, blocks of marble waiting to be vivified. It is to be hoped that money will soon be raised (if that is what is needed) and the building finished. But it may be that Mr. Suydam's money bequest, or the interest on it for some years, is to be applied to this purpose, and that we are only urging what is already resolved on.

In these galleries there is on exhibition a collection of three hundred and seventy-five pictures (more or less, the exact number can only be ascertained by actual count) and fifteen works of sculpture. All these form the exhibition of the Artists' Fund Society. But there are subdivisions which we shall observe. Thus the north gallery is entirely occupied by the pictures, eighty-seven in number, bequeathed by the late James A. Suydam to the Academy of Design. The west gallery is occupied by the contributions of the members of the Artists' Fund Society, and the single "Donation to the Fund" of Miss Edith W. Cook. These are to be sold by auction "on Friday evening, Dec. 29, 1865," presumably the close of the exhibition. The remaining galleries are used for the pictures which are sent for exhibition, most of them loaned by private persons.

Three or four hundred pictures are as many as these galleries can rightly show. We can see now that they were too crowded in the exhibition of the National Academy of Design. There is a better chance to look at the pictures now than there was last spring—at least by daylight. By night the light is very insufficient, or else the gas has been turned down to dimness the two evenings we have been in the galleries. In justice to the painters the galleries ought to be closed at sundown, unless the managers are willing to turn on the gas; and they really ought to make this choice. Then, if they should choose to shut the doors at nightfall, nobody could object, for so far there has been but a slim attendance of spectators, and it would be as well to save the gas and fuel.

These fall exhibitions have never been very good. Let us call attention to the fact that they ought not to be compared to the spring exhibitions. The Academy of Design exhibition is of American pictures only, and of pictures that have never been exhibited before. It always represents, therefore the latest phase of American art; the best work of the previous year of most of the artists of New York and the vicinity. But the Artists' Fund Exhibition takes old and new, American and foreign, good and bad; and rejects nothing, apparently, except water-color drawings, though why it rejects these so uniformly we have never been informed.

There is one great advantage in these autumn exhibitions of this Society: good foreign pictures are by this means brought to the notice of many people who would not see them otherwise. Thus, in this exhibition, No. 91 (though not as fine a Troyon as one or two that are or have been in America); No. 92, "The Greedy Boy," by Edouard Frère; No. 94, "The Forbidden Book," by Kraus; Gérome's famous "Prayer in the Desert," No. 136; De Jonghe's "Trial of Patience," No. 149; James Tissot's noble picture, "Margaret at the Fountain," No. 187; and De Conwer's charming little painting of a picturesque old building, "Church of St. Nicholas, Breslau;"—these pictures, though of such varied merit, are capable of teaching most American painters, and all American non-painters, a great deal about the art. Now, nearly all these foreign pictures have been seen at Mr. Knoedler's or some other gallery, but there are few persons who have ever seen them there compared with the many who might and should see them at the exhibition of the Artists' Fund. There is, by the way, more reason than usual why every student and lover of art should take the present chance to look carefully at these European pictures. There will be soon, if rumor errs not, an important collection of French and English pictures opened to inspection in New York. As poor men do not care to save money when sixpences are all they can save, but will begin to "lay up" in earnest when once they have a nest-egg so the would be student of European painting can go to work with good courage at these few pictures, in the prospect of the many that are to come.

Let us go into the west gallery, where are exhibited the pictures contributed to the Fund. If, in speaking of these, we fail to compare each with the highest standard of excellence, the only standard to which pictures ought generally to be compared, it is because they make so little pretension to be works of art at all. There are not more than half-a-dozen pictures among these three-score that could for one moment sustain any such comparison. The rest are trifles, evidently of little consideration even with their owners. They are of the nature of things for sale at a "ladies' fair;" their intrinsic value is little; they will all sell and all fetch high prices, because of the purposes to which their price is to be put. And we do not blame any artist for sending his least valuable work to such an exhibition, knowing it will sell as well, next Christmas holidays, as would his best study of the same size in the same frame.

We find four little pictures in this gallery of contributions which it is a pleasure to see. Mr. Guy's "Give Me a Swing," No. 17, has, indeed, nothing to recommend it especially except the naturalness of the little girl's action, but that is a great recommendation in a collection where there is so much stilted affectation as we shall presently find in large and important pictures. It is a pretty little picture, the prettier for most picture-buyers because of the spotlessness of the little girl. It is characteristic of Mr. Guy's children and dogs that dirt will not stick to them, and accordingly they can run and play out-doors uncontaminated. There is a better picture by the same artist in another room. Mr. Homer's "Army Boots," No. 46, is very slight and sketchy, but has a great deal of character in it. That is a wonderful black boy on the left. Both are evidently having their pictures taken, but that fact, which is fatal to nine-tenths of the portraits we see, does not hurt these portraits, because the sitters do not try to "make-believe" unconscious. Mr. Eastman Johnson's "Not Enough for Two," No. 49, is, on the whole, better than Mr. Homer's picture, and, therefore, best of the contribution pictures; it comes nearer to Mr. Johnson's highest mark than No. 26 does to Mr. Homer's standard, and is full of excellent childish action. Mr. J. R. Gifford's "Green Mountain, Mt. Desert," No. 50, is a pleasant landscape study—still blue sea in the distance dotted with white boats, broad expanse of wild country, a little cove making into the shore—a small picture rapidly and lightly painted, but very probably a study on the spot, and at all events very pleasant to see. With these four we are almost ready to name Mr. Hennessy's "The Picture's Story," No. 23, and after it come Mr. Griswold's two little landscapes, Nos. 3 and 4, and Mr. Warren's "Mackerel Catching." All these are far beneath what their authors can do easily, and they are all, therefore, undeserving of praise, but they call for a word of greeting as being not wholly without merit or interest.

There are two or three pictures of a curious and seldom equalled badness, of a degree of demerit which puts them far below the standard even of contributions to a ladies' fair. In "The Invalid," No. 34, Mr. Louis Lang has reached what would have been thought the lowest depth of bathos, did we not all remember his picture in last spring's exhibition, "Reminiscences of Lake Mahopac: Ladies Preparing for a Boat-race." This picture would also be thought the worst of the contributions but for the presence among them of Mr. Carter's "Araby's Daughter," No. 25. We shall find Mr. Carter in another gallery with a worse picture than this—because larger. Mr. Rossiter exhibits a "Landscape," No. 5, which is probably as valueless as a landscape can be, having no single merit that a careful examination can discover. And Mr. Benson's "Haying," No. 32, would lead us to advise him, if he would listen to our advice, not to paint any more landscapes until he has begun again at the very beginning, and learned to draw and paint the very simplest bits of landscape detail. His landscape works at present fail to show that he has any of the power or any of the knowledge which a landscape painter needs.

Turning away from the contributed pictures, we find in the other galleries a loan collection of two hundred and thirty more, and, as aforesaid, a few works of sculpture, Mr. Suydam's bequest not being included in our enumeration. It is into this loan collection, of course, that one must look for the strength of the exhibition; and there are a few interesting pictures by American artists, besides the Tissots and Troyons we have named above. But, as a collection, this is one of the worst we remember to have seen. It does not seem worth while to go to the trouble of receiving and hanging these pictures every year, if the resulting show is to be always so poor. Why not abandon the enterprise? Nobody's heart seems to be in it. Nobody seems to be giving thought and attention to the collection as a whole, or to care what sort of "art" he personally contributes to it. The catalogue is an example of the way the whole thing is done. Its badness is the more inexcusable, because the annual N. A. D. catalogue is generally very well got up, and there is no visible cause for hurry in preparing this catalogue; there was no occasion for opening the exhibition last Tuesday evening; there was no need of limiting the time allowed for hanging pictures to the week between the 25th and 31st of October. That it was hurry that has helped spoil the catalogue, is made probable by its late delivery at the galleries, for there was none to be had until the exhibition had been open twenty-four hours; and, when it came at last, it was very badly arranged. The numbers run to 255, then break off and commence with the contributions and run with them to 59, then commence with sculpture at 256 and run to 269, then skip 270 altogether, and take up again the loan-collection of pictures at 271 and finish it. It is crowded with mistakes and typographical errors, and has no index to the artists whose works are on exhibition. The carelessness about the whole undertaking, to which this important part of it bears witness, is inexcusable, and prevents us from conceiving any respect for the concern. Art is worthy of thought, and charity is worthy of thought; if people get up exhibitions of pictures, they should do it well; if people get up charitable enterprises, they should do their best to make them succeed. Here is a combination of both which attracts public attention and asks for public respect, and it should be thoroughly well managed, or else abandoned.

The place of honor in these galleries (which, by the way, was occupied by Mr. Bierstadt's "Yo Semite" picture) is given to "The Triumph of the Cross," by Mr. Emanuel Leutze, numbered 205, and painted, as a vermilion inscription informs us, in 1864. It is, then, Mr. Leutze's latest manner that is represented by this picture. We accept it as such. He has evidently been studying Kaulbach's large pictures, possibly Piloty's pictures as well, as one figure here leads us to infer. He has given an air of novelty to his work; and of a novel gracefulness, however meretricious; and of a novel boldness, however unwarranted. The figures in the foreground are thrown about in attitudes of violent action, as we have never before seen Mr. Leutze's figures. The floating draperies have a specious effectiveness of line and mass, not familiar to us in any of this artist's work. We regard this picture as showing, in many respects, more ability than any of Mr. Leutze's former works, and therefore as more likely to do harm. It shows no improvement in the higher matters of expression and of truthfulness of feeling shown in action. It is as unreal and theoretical as "Washington's Crossing the Delaware." It is as absurdly false in an historical regard as the "Venice Triumphant." It is as incapable of teaching anybody anything or of giving a moment's pleasure as the worst of the Capitol pictures. But it has, what these have but little of, an attractive look, bright colors, "boldness" of drawing, which will pass with many for the boldness of practised knowledge, and varied action in the near foreground that will impress many with the artist's powers of design. We have to fear that this will be a popular picture. And if, as such, it will do half the harm to art that Kaulbach's "Destruction of Jerusalem" has done, or his "Battle of the Huns," we shall have cause enough to regret its existence.

The Alhambra lifts its red towers high on the crest of a hill, whose long slope, at the foot of which the spectator stands, fills the lower half of the picture. A broad road leads up the hill, dividing into two, and sweeping off to right and left, to unite, probably, at the palace. Where the road divides there is a sort of terrace, called in the catalogue an "esplanade," on which Ferdinand and Isabella, mounted, with their suite, are watching the hurry and the stir on the roads below and on either side of them. For a procession of monks, bearing a huge altar, surmounted by a cross and sacred images, choristers, ecclesiastics of high and low degree, and released Christian captives, is rushing (that is the word) up the hill by the left-hand road, while a wild crowd "of the more bigotted Moors" (to quote the catalogue exactly) are getting off as they best can by that on the right, having carelessly taken a road that will bring them into intermediate contact with the triumphant Christians. That they did not do so, that none of this scene took place as represented, it is easy to see; and the unreality of the main idea is made actual impossibility by the details. Here is a Moorish woman, with a very light and open dress for travelling, whose goods which she takes away are two goats that run beside her, and a kid which she is carrying—easily, it must be confessed. Here is another woman on a mule, halted exactly in the path, and, of course, checking the flight. Here are two stalwart Moors, vigorously tearing their clothes and beating their heads as they run (in the way people run on the stage) down the hill, the explosion of their grief not taking place as they first see the approaching cross, for that has passed, but seeming continuous and likely to last them as far as Africa. It is useless to describe, one by one, the numerous separate absurdities of this pretentious work. It is to be hoped that, in spite of our fears, it may be soon as completely forgotten as it deserves to be.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL TALK.

As a specimen of what good things can be done in the way of concerts, we quote one of the programmes of Mr. Alfred Mellon's "Promenade Concerts" at the Covent Garden Theatre, which he gave frequently during the summer with a band of eighty of the best musicians of London. He devoted special evenings to composers and schools, and had a Beethoven night, a Spohr night, a Mendelssohn night, and an Italian night. The Italian night commenced with Spontini's overture to "Nourmahal," which he brought out when conducting the royal opera at Berlin, the opera being suggested by a ballet called "Lalla Rookh," and the overture being an imitation of Rossini's to "Semiramide." This was followed by the overture to "Guillaume Tell," by Rossini, and by that to "Anacréon ou l'Amour Fugitif," the twenty-fourth work of Cherubini, and produced at the Théâtre Feydeau, in 1803, which long ago became classic. Besides this were Ernst's fantasia for the violin on the "March and Willow Song" in Rossini's "Otello;" the liberty duet from "I Puritani," arranged for the ophicleide and euphonium, with a horn obligato accompaniment; the barcarole of Ricci, "Sulla poppa del mio brik," and an aria from "Linda di Chamounix," sung by Carlotta Patti, not to speak of other miscellaneous pieces. On the Mozart night were given the G minor symphony, the little known overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," the piano sonata No. 7 in D, played by Mary Krebs, a German pianiste of growing fame, the adagio from the concerto for the clarionet, the two grand arias of the Queen of Night in "Die Zauberflöte," sung by Carlotta Patti, and "Non piu andrai," sung by Ferranti. Concerts such as these are worth imitation.

—We hear from France that Gounod is writing a new opera, in five acts, on the story of "Romeo and Juliet." Three acts are already finished, and are said to be more than equal to "Faust." They contain the duel, the balcony scene, the scene of the grave, an episode with Friar Lorenzo, and three love duets. We can scarcely imagine a subject better suited to Gounod's genius than this play of Shakespeare. The opera will be brought out next year. His publisher, Choudens, announces a "Petit Oratorio" as nearly ready, called "Tobias." A psalm of his, "By the Rivers of Babylon," has just been sung at the concerts of the Paris Conservatory. Gounod's operas, other than "Faust," have never met with the success they deserve, principally owing to the librettos. "La Reine de Saba" is, perhaps, an exception. Two beautiful choruses ought to be brought out at some of the concerts here, especially the "Chœur des Sabéennes: Déjà l'aube matinale." This was lately rechristened "Irene," with a changed plot, for the English opera at London, and the whole music, without the voice, was given at the Crystal Palace concerts. "La Nonne Sanglante" contains ballet music superior to that of "Faust," and which will bear favorable comparison with that of "Robert le Diable." "Le Médecin malgré lui" has had a considerable run in the English opera under the name of "The Mock Doctor."

—German papers assert that Berlioz has not only written but printed memoirs of his life, which, however, are not to be given to the public till after his death. This will be an important work in musical literature. All will remember his "Soirées d'orchestre," where he showed fine critical powers, and his "Voyage musical," describing his studies in Rome, where he would not study at all, in which he displayed a lively sense of the grotesque side of life, and a shrewd use of the pen.

—Berlioz's prediction that Ernst, like Paganini, would make the world talk about him, was long ago fulfilled. Long has he stood the first living master of the violin. For some years he had been out of health, smitten with paralysis, and was sojourning at Nice, where he died on the 8th of October. Heinrich Wilhelm Ernst was born at Brünn, in Moravia, in 1813. He very early obtained admission to the Conservatory of Vienna, where he studied under Mayseder, and became acquainted with Paganini, who befriended and instructed him. In 1830 he visited the Rhine country, and with youthful boldness gave concerts in Paganini's footsteps. His early manner was an imitation of his master's, but he soon struck out a style of his own. Robert Schumann wrote of him years ago: "Ernst, like Paganini, has got the art of pleasing all sections, and winning them to his style at will, for his very versatile talent has enabled him to penetrate and become familiar with all schools. In power of improvisation, also, the most charming talent in a player, he approaches Paganini, which may in some degree be the consequence of his intimate early association with that master. The great Italian magician, on leaving the world of art, confided to Ernst the mysteries of his method, for the study of the mature artist, the emulation of the student, and the delight of all."

—We have also to record the death of another musician, William Vincent Wallace, the composer of "Maritana." The child of a band-master, and born at Waterford, Ireland, in 1815, he early became able to play on every instrument of the orchestra, and was proficient on the clarionet as well as a fine player on the piano and violin. At the age of twelve he was able to lead an orchestra. When eighteen his health broke down, and he went to New South Wales, where he continued for some time engaged in agricultural pursuits. He soon abandoned that, and commenced giving concerts at Sydney, whence he went to India and South America, living a life of even greater adventure than travelling musicians usually do. He fought duels, and was concerned in many intrigues, and even joined a tribe of savages, conforming to all their usages. He returned to England by way of the United States, and brought out there "Maritana," his first opera, with great success. From that time on he was busily at work as a composer, and wrote several operas, "Matilda of Hungary," "Lurlei," "The Maid of Zurich," "Olga," which were performed in England and on the Continent. In 1849 he was commissioned to write an opera for the Grand Opera at Paris, but had hardly commenced the work when he became blind. For the sake of regaining his sight he sailed for Rio Janeiro, and afterwards came here, where he lived for several years. He returned to England about five years ago, but with broken health. For the last year he had been living at Passy, near Paris, but had recently gone to the Pyrenees in the hope of recuperating himself. There he has just died. He married, we believe, a sister of Mr. Robert Stoepel, of Winter Garden.

The Engravings executed on Wood, in the highest style of the Art, by Messrs. Bobbett & Hooper.

It was the aim of the Publishers to make this work the most perfect Art-Volume yet produced in America. To this end they were so fortunate as to secure, from the beginning, the hearty co-operation of the leading Painters and Artists of the NATIONAL ACADEMY—many of them now for the first time appearing in the pages of an illustrated book. As the drawings have been exclusively contributed by the Artists of the Academy, including in the list the most distinguished names in American Art, THE WORK PRESENTS A HIGHER ORDER AND MORE BRILLIANT ARRAY OF ARTISTIC TALENT THAN WERE EVER BEFORE ASSEMBLED IN ONE PUBLICATION.

The Engraving was intrusted to gentlemen of acknowledged skill, who have performed their task in a manner to especially win the approval of the artists by whom the drawings were made.

The Printing has also been executed in a style unsurpassed, and has received the hearty commendation of connoisseurs who have examined the sheets.

It is confidently believed that, for the exquisite finish and brilliancy of its numerous illustrations, and the perfection of all its mechanical features, the work will be regarded by all lovers of elegant books as a great advance over the productions of its class that have yet appeared.

The Literary portion of the work is novel and attractive, comprising a concentration of the most perfect and brilliant passages of our great poets, English and American, from the age of Chaucer to the present time, interspersed with brief comments, anecdotes, and criticism—thereby affording a rich treasury of the poetic wealth of the language.

The work forms an elegant quarto volume of 392 pages, printed on toned paper, and bound by MATTHEWS, in rich and elegant styles of morocco, etc.

"Take unto you the whole armour of God."

The object of this unique and novel work is to bring the Fine Arts to the aid of the great spiritual truths of religion, and, by presenting them to the eye in a picturesque and attractive shape, to impress them more deeply on the mind. The illustrations comprise a series of

RICHLY ILLUMINATED PLATES,

EMBLAZONED IN GOLD AND COLORS,

In the style of the Ancient Missal Decorations, improved and chastened by the refinements of Modern Art.

In them the Apostolic emblems are portrayed, and their sacred significance is indicated, each being accompanied by an appropriate Poem, and surrounded by floral and arabesque borders, all appropriately referring to the divine injunctions of the Sacred Text. In one elegant quarto volume, massively bound in Turkey morocco, bevelled, antique, richly gilt sides and edges, price $20; in cloth, bevelled and extra gilt, $15. Put up in a neat box.

II.

THE BOOK OF RUBIES.

A COLLECTION OF THE MOST NOTABLE LOVE POEMS IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

In 1 vol. crown 8vo, printed by Alvord, in 2 colors, on superfine extra calendered tinted paper, bound in extra illuminated cloth, full gilt, $7; in Turkey, extra antique, $10. Put up in a neat box.

The Editor of this work announces his aims to be, besides grouping together the finest erotic poems of our tongue, to present a view of the progress of the class of poetry treated, from the earliest date to the present day.

There is no love poem of note omitted, and with all those gems long known to the public, there are numerous others hitherto overlooked because of the demerits of the authors in other fields of literary labor or because they were the single songs of those who never sung well but once. Arrayed with reference to the dates at which the authors flourished, the poems furnish a fair view of the progress of erotic poetry, and allow a comparison of styles and merit not to be otherwise attained except by laborious and not over-profitable reading. Every shade of human passion, except the sensual, is illustrated, and it confers credit on the editor to see how happily pure is the result of his labors.

It is believed that this work will be found the most complete and best arranged in its contents, as it is the most elegant in mechanical execution. The author has brought to light the most precious ores he could find in his explorations in the wealthy mines of amatory poetry, and the result is a work which sparkles with the love-thoughts of all ages.

READ WHAT THE PAPERS SAY:

The Pittsburg Christian Advocate says: "The best paper for children, published in this great country of ours, is The Little Corporal. It is a gem in the catalogue of monthlies."

Forney's Philadelphia Daily Press says of it: "Judging from the appearance of the two numbers before us, The Little Corporal is destined to become the great children's paper of America."

"A NEW CHILD'S PAPER.—We have received two copies of The Little Corporal. Judging from these specimens, it is the cleverest thing of its kind yet realized in America. Its whole appearance is in capital taste, and there is evidence in it that its editor has rare tact in catering for the wants of the little ones."—Roxbury [Mass.] Journal.

"Certainly, we have seen nothing in the shape of a child's paper which could compare with this, which comes to us from over the prairies."—Portland [Maine] Daily Press.

"We cannot say too much in favor of this beautiful paper."—Bryan [O.] Union Press.

"It already excels every children's paper we know of in this country."—Chicago Evening Journal.

"The children will be better and happier from reading it."—Henry [Ill.] Courier.

"Indeed, there is no paper of the kind published that approaches it as a juvenile journal."—Poughkeepsie Daily Press.

We might quote hundreds similar to the above, but these will suffice now.

TO CLERGYMEN THROUGHOUT THE UNITED STATES:

As editor of THE LITTLE CORPORAL, I hope to induce Ministers to favor the circulation of my paper among their children as a means of doing them good; and I ask each one to send me the name of some intelligent and respectable lady (for whose integrity he can vouch), who will be willing to energetically canvass her own neighborhood for subscribers to THE LITTLE CORPORAL.

Any Minister addressing me, as shown above, will receive by next mail Circulars, showing the opinions of the Press, and will also be informed in relation to the percentage allowed to canvassers; and may also obtain the paper for his own family at half price.

Address as above stated.

THE LIFE OF

MICHAEL ANGELO.

BY HERMAN GRIMM.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN BY FANNY ELIZABETH BUNNETT.

Two Vols. Crown 8vo, $5 00.

"We can most accurately characterize it as a history of painting, sculpture, and architecture in Italy in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries—great times, in which Titian and Giorgione, Michael Angelo and Raphael, were rivals. The book also treats of Angelo as a poet; and is particularly rich in his correspondence, much of it not previously published. Each volume is enriched with an appendix, into which the translator has gathered a variety of notes, explanations, corrections, and illustrations."—Philadelphia Press.

It is throughout a faithful piece of literary labor, into which the author has put his entire heart. The subject is evidently congenial to his taste, and he has wrought upon it with that unflagging zeal which genuine interest alone can give. He is nowhere careless, nowhere superficial: when we have laid down his book, we have the assurance that we know everything about the life and labors of Michael Angelo that the most patient research, the most careful and conscientious investigation, can find for us. And we have rarely had occasion to differ with Grimm in his estimate of Michael Angelo as an artist: at least our difference has never been in kind, but only in degree. We do not consider that he has, on the whole, overvalued or overpraised his subject. And his speculations on art, if not always sound, if sometimes a little strained, are always ingenious and the result of reflection. His remarks at the close of the work on the great and growing importance of literature as compared with art, and the causes of it, are original and striking.

"And our author has a proper comprehension, and gives his readers a proper impression, of the moral greatness of Michael Angelo, and it is from this source that no small portion of his fame and influence is derived. For his character was equal to his genius. One of the greatest of artists, he was also one of the greatest of men. There was that in his life which was higher than the highest of his works. A painter, a sculptor, an architect, and a poet, he was as a man singularly free from the defects and infirmities to which the temperament of the artist is exposed. He was rigidly abstemious in his habits, of strict purity in his relations with women, wholly indifferent to money, of lofty independence of character, and with an insatiable love of labor. The biography of such a man, so amply and copiously told, has a moral value independently of its worth as a contribution to the history of art. All men are not qualified to judge of Michael Angelo's merits as an artist, even if they had the opportunity to study his works, but all can comprehend the moral grandeur of his life, and to feel this we have only to read the work before us."—Boston Advertiser.

PIONEERS OF FRANCE IN THE NEW WORLD.

BY FRANCIS PARKMAN,

Author of "The Conspiracy of Pontiac."

Crown 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

"A narrative which has all the animation, variety, and interest of a romance, and to most readers it will be as fresh and novel as a pure creation of the imaginative faculty. . . The leading, the indispensable merit of thoroughness of research and faithful investigation of all sources of information—that excellence without which, at this day, no felicity of style can secure for an historical work any permanent place in public regard—this volume possesses in the largest measure."—The World.

"Mr. Parkman is already known to fame as one of the most accomplished writers who have made the early history of their country the subject of deep and continued study, assembling for its illustration all the sources that the private relations of discoverers and travellers or that the archives of the parent states in Europe can supply. Mr. Parkman's book is an indispensable supplement and companion to all the existing histories of the United States."—New York Times.

"Mr. Parkman has that prime merit of an historian, the conscientious study and comparison of original documents. He has that hearty enthusiasm which gives warmth and life alike to subject and reader, making his books wholesome reading for both old and young."—North American Review.

JEAN INGELOW'S WRITINGS.

POEMS.

One Volume 16mo, cloth, gilt top.....price $1 75
half Turkey Roxburgh..... " 3 00 full smooth morocco..... " 4 50

(GEORGE W. CURTIS, in Harper's Monthly.)

It is not easy to answer, What is a poet? But it is very easy to know by the feeling deep down in the heart when you are reading poetry. That is the answer which will be made to the question whether Jean Ingelow is a poet. Was the English language ever more musical than in her verses?

(JOHN G. WHITTIER.)

I have read Miss Ingelow's poems with great satisfaction—glad that such a singer lives.

She has written the best ballad of our time, in her "HIGH TIDE ON THE COAST OF LINCOLNSHIRE."

(RALPH WALDO EMERSON.)

It seemed quite needless to praise these poems, so manifest and so charming is the talent shown in them. She has a wonderful ear and lyric facility, an eye for the beauty and significance of nature, thought that clothes itself in images, and a general intellectual strength. But the delicious melody of the verse could almost spare the other gifts

(NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE.)

The poems of this gifted lady have given me singular pleasure, still increasing, in several cases, on a second or third repetition.

(HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.)

I have read the book both with interest and admiration, and am very glad that it has met with such a cordial welcome in this country.

STUDIES FOR STORIES,

FROM GIRLS' LIVES.

One Volume 16mo, cloth .....price $1 75.

(Athenæum.)

Simple in style, warm with human affection, and written in faultless English, these five stories are studies for the artist, sermons for the thoughtful, and a rare source of delight for all who can find pleasure in really good works of prose fiction. . . . They are prose poems, carefully meditated and exquisitely touched in by a teacher ready to sympathize with every joy and sorrow.

(The Spectator.)

There could not be a better book to put into the hands of young ladies.

(The Pall Mall Gazette.)

Each of these studies is a drama in itself, illustrative of the operation of some particular passion—such as envy, misplaced ambition, sentimentalism, indolence, jealousy. In all of them the actors are young girls, and we cannot imagine a better book for young ladies.

(The Glasgow Herald.)

These five stories are told with remarkable ability. The characters are carefully delineated, and there is a quiet grace and simplicity both in the conception and working out of the varied plots. They owe none of their interest to violence and crime, but are healthy in tone, and fresh and entertaining, because they depict for us, in a natural manner, some of the lights and shades that go to make up the lives of ordinary men and women.

(The Eclectic Review.)

These "Studies for Stories" are graceful and elegant, and something far more and better. They show a crystalline faultlessness of language, and a clear and charming appreciation of nature. A more graceful present for a young lady we could scarcely expect to find.

(The London Quarterly Review.)

These are very charming stories, and our readers can hardly do better than make choice of them for presents to their daughters.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

Improvements in Piano-fortes.

One of the simplest and most truly valuable improvements yet made in the Piano-forte is that invented and patented by Mr. David Decker, of the firm of

in this city. By correcting the only imperfections arising from the use of the full iron-plate, and that, too, by not detracting in the slightest degree from its many positive advantages, the Messrs. DECKER have developed in their instruments a tone at once admirable for its purity, fulness, prolongation, and sweetness, and the high estimation in which their improvement is held is well shown in the rapidly increasing business of their firm.—Tribune.

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE CO.,

112 and 114 BROADWAY.

EVERY ONE SHOULD ENSURE.

While we live we may protect those dependent upon us; but when death severs the tie of all others most dear, it is a consolation to know that our prudence and foresight have made provision for the wants to which we can no longer minister; and the man who has the power, but neglects the opportunity, of providing in this way for the comfort and independence of his family, fails in the duty which he owes to them and himself. Therefore, let every one who has not obtained a policy of Insurance upon his life, no longer neglect this imperative duty. GREAT CARE SHOULD BE MANIFESTED IN THE SELECTION OF A COMPANY. The

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE CO.

Offers the following highly important essentials:

It is a strictly Mutual Company;
It has had Twenty Years' Business Experience;
It has large Accumulated Assets;
It gives Liberal Assistance in the Payment of Premiums;
Its Dividends are declared Annually;
It is prompt in the Payment of all Losses.

IN FACT,

Special care in the selection of its risks, strict economy, and a safe and judicious investment of its funds, emphatically characterize the management of this Company.

Assets over

$4,500,000.

Annual Dividend, January 1, 1865,

50 Per Cent.

Total Amount Returned Premiums (Dividends) paid,

Total Amount Claims by Death paid,

$3,500,000.

During its existence it has issued

Over 36,000 Policies.

TEN-YEAR NON-FORFEITING POLICIES.

The New York Life Insurance Company originated, and was the first to bring before the public, the Ten-Year Non-Forfeiting Plan, which has so fully commended itself to the judgment of thinking men that it has become the most popular mode of assurance, and is rapidly superseding the old method of life-long payment. It has received THE UNQUALIFIED APPROVAL OF THE BEST BUSINESS MEN OF THE LAND, large numbers of whom have taken out policies under it as an investment.

TEN-YEAR NON-FORFEITING PLAN.

A party ensuring by this table, after the second year, cannot forfeit any part of what has been paid in, and his policy becomes a source of income to him while living.

ANOTHER NEW FEATURE.

TEN YEAR NON-FORFEITURE ENDOWMENT POLICIES.

The New York Life Insurance Company have recently prepared A NEW TABLE, BY WHICH THE PREMIUMS CAN ALL BE PAID IN TEN YEARS AND THE NON-FORFEITURE BENEFIT ALSO SECURED. These policies are coming into general request. As a sure and profitable investment for one's declining years, they deserve the attention of all. A party ensuring by this table the amount is received by the assured himself, upon his attaining a specified age, while full provision is made for death occurring prior thereto.

POLICIES ISSUED ON ALL THE USUAL FORMS.
